The construction of the Panama Canal has been a matter of absorbing interest to the American people for a number of decades. It was conceived that it might be of great advantage to the American people both in lessening the expense of maintaining our Navy and in reducing the cost of railroad transportation. It is well known that there is a certain class of heavy freight that can not be economically carried across the continent by rail, a class of freight that could move slowly by water at a minimum expense and reduce the cost of all those commodities to the consuming public. It has been the dream of the American people that with the completion of the canal our interior waterways would be improved and developed; that the great Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers would ultimately serve through competition to steady railway rates throughout all the Middle West. This conception of the situation finally culminated in our undertaking the great task. The project was opposed by every railroad in the United States and every interest allied with the railroads until opposition became useless. With the completion of the canal a material change of conditions of transportation from American port to American port will have been brought about. What policy will be found most expedient in the future is largely a matter of conjecture.

In 1912 a Republican administration passed the Panama Canal act, one provision of which exempted from the payment of tolls American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. During the same year the Democratic Party and the Progressive Party each in its national platform approved and declared for that policy. Whether the policy was a wise one I shall not take the time of the House to discuss. It may be wise or unwise at this particular time. It is a subject, however, which, in my judgment, the people and the Congress of the United States should retain control of, to adopt such policies from time to time and enact such legislation as may be deemed wise and expedient.

The President's message, however, while it mentions the economic question, does not present it for the consideration of Congress, for he presents another question which entirely absorbs it. The President says that the provision of law referred to is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain. The contention is that we have relinquished by that treaty the right to permit the use of our canal to any class of American trade or to any class of American ships upon any terms less favorable than we permit its use to foreign trade and ships. If this contention is sound, it matters not whether free American ships be a wise or an unwise policy, for we have relinquished the right and the power to exercise our judgment upon that question.

Under these circumstances, as to whether the provision in question embodies a mistaken economic policy, I am not so deeply concerned as I am with respect to the other question. The question of economics in this connection being purely one of domestic concern, I take it that no grave or far-reaching complications are likely to attend its solution. The question as to whether the United States shall be free to adopt whatever domestic economic policies she may see fit is, in my opinion, a matter of very grave concern to every American citizen. At a very early period of our history it was recognized that the supremacy of the United States upon the Western Hemisphere was a condition highly essential to the safety and welfare of the American people. Recognition of that fact impelled this Government to declare to the world its intention to maintain that supremacy. During a like period it has been the unmistakable policy of this country to maintain its own independence with respect to all of its internal and domestic affairs. Now to recede from that position and to recognize the feasibility of sharing in any degree with other nations, and especially the nations of the Eastern Hemisphere, that complete independence that has always characterized our national domestic policy I would regard as a precedent extremely portentous to our national respect and welfare.

But, sir, have we violated any of our treaty obligations? Are we just objects of censure by the nations of the world? Have we ceased to entertain a decent respect to the opinions of mankind? In 1850 the United States had but recently acquired all of that territory now constituting our Pacific coast from Mexico to Canada. Gold had been discovered in California the year before; and our people, whose settlement was almost exclusively confined to the eastern half of the country, were becoming very much interested in the Pacific slope. In addition to this, we were interested very materially in the world's trade and the desirability of an isthmian canal connecting our two coasts was clearly recognized. At that time we as a nation had no territorial possessions upon the Isthmus. In this respect Great Britain was similarly situated. Great Britain, however, did have Caribbean island possessions and was at that time likewise interested to see a canal constructed across the Isthmus, and, in common with the United States, desired such canal to be protected and neutralized. For this purpose and to this end our Government entered into the treaty of 1850 with the Government of Great Britain.

By the terms of that treaty the Governments of the United States and Great Britain agreed that neither would ever obtain for itself any exclusive control over the proposed canal; that neither would ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same; that neither would ever assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; and both Governments agreed to guarantee the neutrality of the proposed canal and any other canals or communications that might be afterwards constructed. Time passed, but by reason of the magnitude of the task and many other conditions which have now become matters of history none of the projected canals was ever completed. A half a century elapsed, and conditions not only on the Isthmus but such as affected the United States, Great Britain, and the world at large had materially changed. The necessity for a canal across the Isthmus had become more urgent and apparent. No European nation was in a position to perform the work or to complete the canal that had for a long time been in the course of construction. It became evident that if a canal was to be built the task must devolve upon the United States or on some one under its auspices and patronage. The plan contemplated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had become utterly unfeasible. The treaty, while not formally abrogated, was effectually dead. It remained, therefore, if the canal was to be constructed and if the United States and Great Britain were to cooperate in guaranteeing its neutrality, for a new treaty to be made.

Under these conditions the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated and concluded. During the negotiations many important matters were discussed and settled. It was first suggested by Great Britain that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 should remain in force, with certain amendments. This proposition the United States rejected, and demanded that the present treaty entirely supersede the previous one. It was suggested also by Great Britain that the two nations together prescribe the rules which should stand as a basis of the neutralization of this canal. This proposition the United States also rejected, and insisted that the United States was the proper authority to prescribe such rules. Upon both of these matters, as well as others, Great Britain yielded, and when the treaty was presented in its final draft the preamble recited that the United States and Great Britain, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route expedient, and to remove any objection which might arise out of the convention of 1850 to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, appointed their plenipotentiaries.

The first article provided that—

> The present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

The second article agreed that the canal should be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by aid to individuals or corporations, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, this Government should enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. Article 3 provided that the United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal certain rules substantially embodied in the convention of Constantinople relating to the Suez Canal. These rules are set forth in six separate paragraphs. I shall hereafter refer to a number of these particular rules.

At the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded in 1901 it was quite generally supposed that the canal to be constructed by or under the auspices of the United States would follow what is known as the Nicaraguan route through the upper and wider neck of the Isthmus. Prolonged consideration, however, was given to the matter of selecting the particular route by this Government, and we did not conclude definitely upon that matter before a very material change had occurred with respect to the sovereignty over that portion of the Isthmus later embraced within the Republic of Panama. Panama became an independent Republic, and this Government, having finally concluded that the Panama route was more feasible and expedient than the Nicaraguan route, entered into negotiations with the Republic of Panama for the cession to the United States of a zone of territory sufficient to accommodate the purposes of such route. As a result of such negotiations the treaty of 1903 was concluded with the Republic of Panama. By the terms of that treaty the United States undertook to guarantee the independence of the Republic of Panama, and the Republic of Panama granted to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land 10 miles wide for the construction and maintenance of the canal in question. That cession is recognized by all as bringing that zone under the sovereignty of the United States and making it a part of the territory of the United States. Through that zone across the Isthmus the United States, at a cost of approximately $400,000,000, has constructed and completed a great ship canal. It has fortified it and assumed its protection and offers its advantages upon equal and equitable terms to all mankind as comprised by the nations of the world.

Having constructed the canal through her own territory at such cost and having undertaken such a lasting burden, this country naturally assumed that as an attribute of ownership we were entitled to deal with it as we thought best so far as its use pertained to our internal and domestic affairs. Therefore, having in mind the benefits that might accrue from such a course, Congress enacted legislation exempting from the payment of tolls on their passage through the canal American ships engaged in our coastwise trade. This action upon the part of Congress has brought the protest from Great Britain that by this law we have violated our obligations to Great Britain and other nations under the treaty of 1901. This protest was made as soon as the legislation was proposed and before it was finally enacted. During the second session of the Sixty-second Congress, before which the bill for the act was pending, prolonged debate was had upon the subject both in the House and in the Senate, and as a result of the deliberations of the two Houses Congress declined to accept Great Britain's views of the case and passed the bill. The bill then in due course passed to the consideration of President Taft, who also gave the matter profound consideration, and upon such consideration he approved the bill. The interpretation placed upon the treaty of 1901 by the United States has not only been approved by President Roosevelt, his Attorney General, and his Secretary of State; by President Taft, his Attorney General, and his Secretary of State, but by both Houses of Congress after prolonged consideration and debate.

The question is again presented in the form and under the circumstances that I have related. We are asked by the present occupant of the White House to accept Great Britain's claims and her interpretation of our action without raising the question whether we are right or wrong and to repeal the law. But, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to the opinion that we will think about that. I am inclined to the opinion that the Congress of the United States will first demand to be convinced that we are wrong before acknowledging the justness of the accusation.

A treaty is a compact between sovereign states duly negotiated and concluded by the treaty-making authority under the treaty-making power. Matters the subject of treaty negotiation and convention are those which by their nature are of international concern. Treaties differ from mere matters of municipal law not only in the manner of their making, but in respect to the nature of their subject matter. In interpreting a treaty, therefore, we should not stand entirely upon the letter of particular clauses and sentences, but we should have in mind its subject matter, its purpose, and the limitations of authority of the agencies through which it is negotiated and concluded. A treaty is an adversary compact and can not be viewed altogether as a statute or a constitution from the standpoint of single authority, but must be viewed and judged from the opposing positions of the several parties signatory. In this case the treaty was negotiated between the limited monarchy of Great Britain and the Republic of the United States. It must be assumed that the plenipotentiaries representative of the respective parties were familiar with the forms and structure of the several governments immediately concerned; that Lord Pauncefote knew in this instance that the United States was a Government of divided powers prescribed by a written Constitution; that under that Constitution all legislative power is vested in the Congress of the United States, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives; that the executive power is vested in the President of the United States, with the qualification that, in exercising the treaty-making power which is specially conferred upon him, he shall have the advice and consent of the Senate—not, however, in a legislative capacity, but in a capacity executive.

Those who contend for the accuracy of the interpretation placed upon the treaty of 1901 by Great Britain cite us the first sentence of rule 1 under article 3 of that treaty. This sentence declares—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

It is contended that this language includes the coastwise trade of the United States, and therefore legislation exempting such traffic from the payment of tolls, when tolls are charged ships of other nations engaged in the foreign trade, is discrimination against such nations, their citizens and subjects.

Let us examine this question. The only reservation made by Great Britain in the preamble of this treaty is that "The 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8" of the convention of 1850 shall not be impaired. The state of neutrality was the condition in the minds of the respective parties. Now, neutrality is a term having reference to the conduct of a nation or nations with respect to the belligerency, present or potential, of other nations. It is a matter that directly concerns peace and war. Neutrality and neutralization are not terms usually adopted as applicable to general commerce except when considered in its relation to the question of belligerency.

What was the purpose in mind when these six rules were adopted and incorporated in the treaty? We have only to turn to the article itself to enlighten ourselves upon this question. The article recites, "As a basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules," and so forth, are adopted. The matter of neutralization was the condition that the parties were striving for. The general principle of neutralization was the object sought to be attained. These six rules were formulated as a basis of that object only, and that object is the polar star which should guide in every attempt to accurately interpret this treaty. Vattel, in his great work upon the Law of Nations, says:

> The reason of the law or of the treaty—that is to say, the motive which leads to the making of it and the object in contemplation at the time—is the most certain clue to lead us to the discovery of its true meaning; and great attention should be paid to this circumstance whenever there is question either of explaining an obscure, ambiguous, indeterminate passage in a law or treaty or of applying it to a particular case. When once we certainly know the reason which alone has determined the will of the person speaking, we ought to interpret and apply his words in a manner suitable to that reason alone; otherwise he will be made to speak and act contrary to his intention, and in opposition to his own views. (Book 2, ch. 17, sec. 287.)

Only by a "too strained or refined reading" of the first rule can its language be distorted so as to include the domestic commerce of the United States. But it may be suggested that the rule expressly says "the vessels of commerce and of war." Very true; but would not equal and uniform treatment of the vessels of commerce of other nations by the United States in connection with this canal be a condition highly calculated to maintain a state of peace and harmony among such nations as well as between them and the United States? Is there not ample reason for the use of the language employed upon this ground? But what concerns the peace and harmony of the world as to whether we charge our own ships, engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade, and with respect to which trade all other nations are excluded, tolls for passing through our own canal?

Again, it should not be overlooked that it was the United States that adopted not only this rule, but the entire six rules as a basis of neutralization. The United States declined to permit Great Britain to be a party in the prescribing of these rules. An examination of these six rules ought to make it clear to everyone who seeks the truth that they were intended to apply to nations other than the United States. Indeed, it is not even now contended that the last five rules are obligatory upon vessels of war of the United States as they are upon vessels of war of foreign nations. Such contention could not be maintained for a moment. If these rules were to apply to the United States as to other nations, then, under the second rule, should the United States be so unfortunate as to be at war with another nation, she could not blockade her own canal. Neither Great Britain nor any of her champions contend for any such proposition. The second rule does not say that the United States shall not blockade the canal; it says:

> The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility committed within it.

Great Britain has already made it clear by her diplomatic notes that she understands that should the United States become a belligerent she would be entitled to all of the privileges of self-defense, regardless of the treaty. There is not a requirement contained in rules 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6 which anyone contends would govern the conduct of the United States with respect to the canal in case the United States should be a belligerent party. No one has had the temerity to urge that in case we should be at war with England, Japan, or any other nation, we would not have the right to close the canal to the war fleets of our enemy. That was the main purpose we had in fortifying the canal. Rule 5 provides:

> A vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

What application has such a rule to the United States in case she should be at war? None whatever. That was a rule prescribed by the United States to govern the belligerents of other nations with respect to our property. Now, if five of the six rules have practically no application to the United States, upon what ground are we to contend that by the first rule the United States relinquished her inherent rights over her domestic commerce and its instrumentalities? And this in the light of the fact that we were not negotiating a trade treaty, but merely prescribing rules of neutralization.

When was the relinquishment by any nation of the right to govern and control its domestic commerce regarded as an essential to the general principle of neutralization? Never within the history of the world. And if the treaty in question is to receive the interpretation now contended for by the friends of Great Britain, a new principle will be written into the law of nations, and the domestic affairs of each nation will cease to be a matter for its exclusive control. I contend that these six rules, framed and adopted by the United States, were so framed and adopted for the purpose of prescribing the rules and conditions under which the other nations of the world might use this canal. For the purpose of giving the canal a neutral character, among other things the United States has said that we will accord equal treatment with reference to vessels of both commerce and war of all the nations of the earth observing our rules and who desire the use of our canal. But we never said and we never intended to say that when we were at war with any nation this great strategic instrumentality should be neutral. Indeed, the paramount consideration for the building of this canal at this enormous expense was to render more efficient our Navy and permit us to protect our two coasts, without repeating the occurrence that transpired during our War with Spain. In sending the Oregon around Cape Horn we gave the world a wonderful exhibition of our naval equipment, but we also illustrated the great difficulty and disadvantage under which we labored with respect to the protection of our two coasts. The canal was constructed by the United States to be neutral as between all other nations, but as between the United States and the world in arms it must stand, and will stand, as a stupendous implement of war.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason that indicates clearly the error of Great Britain's position. The subject of the coastwise trade of the United States is a matter entirely domestic; it begins and ends in the United States; it is trade among the citizens of the United States. During our entire history we have recognized, and the world has recognized, that trade to be a matter entirely of domestic concern and the proper subject of legislation by the Congress of the United States. The authority of Congress over this class of trade is established not only by that clause of the Constitution which vests all legislative power in Congress, but by the commerce clause as well. No one has ever doubted this or questioned it. It is verified by our entire history, our legislation, and our judicial decisions. Regulation of this class of commerce and its instrumentalities has been clearly committed to the Congress and not to the treaty-making power. This fact must be presumed to have been present in the minds of the respective plenipotentiaries when the treaty in question was negotiated and concluded. The line of demarcation between the treaty-making power and the legislative power had been recognized by governments of divided powers. True, this line is not always clear and apparent, but as much can be said of the limitations of all other departments of government. The rule has been well recognized by Governments, legislative bodies, and writers upon the subject that treaties clearly embracing subjects of legislation require the auxiliary action of the legislature to make them effective. The further rule is clearly recognized that where the treaty-making power oversteps its exclusive authority and embraces subjects fairly within the province of legislation the legislative authority may repeal and nullify that part of the treaty.

Our Government is said to be a Government of checks and balances; that each of the three great divisions is equal and coordinate with the others, each supreme within its own sphere. No one of these divisions may rightfully invade the province of either of the others, and so the equilibrium of the whole is maintained.

If the Executive under the treaty-making power could invade and usurp the legislative power, we would be at the mercy of the President and the Senate, and the people's great and last bulwark, the House of Representatives, would be broken down.

Mr. Speaker, the whole argument on this question can be resolved into a few direct basic propositions. I shall state them as they appear to me:

First. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, with the reservation of one point only—"the general principle of neutralization."

Second. The treaty of 1901 was exclusively a treaty of neutralization as distinguished from a commercial or trade compact.

Third. Under the treaty of 1901 the United States was accorded all of the rights of ownership of the canal, subject only to the general principle of neutralization established.

Fourth. All the rules prescribed in the treaty of 1901 were adopted by the United States as a basis of neutralization only.

Fifth. The treatment, control, and regulation of the domestic commerce of the United States and all of its instrumentalities is a matter which does not concern foreign nations, and is not germane to the question of neutralization.

Sixth. The authority to prescribe rules of neutralization and neutrality is vested by the Constitution of the United States in the treaty-making power, which is essentially executive.

Seventh. The authority to regulate trade and commerce and all its instrumentalities is, by the Constitution of the United States, vested in the Congress of the United States, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

Eighth. Throughout the entire history of our country the power of Congress with respect to all matters touching our national domestic trade and commerce has been acknowledged to be supreme and unlimited, except by the provisions of the Constitution itself, and this power, by an unbroken line of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, has been held to extend to the repeal and abrogation of any treaty provision which invades such exclusive legislative power.

Ninth. It is the height of absurdity to assume either that Great Britain was ignorant of our form of government and its division of powers, or that her plenipotentiaries understood or believed that the United States, through its Executive, had engaged to perpetually relinquish as a basis of neutralization rights entirely foreign to the question of neutralization and the authority over which had, by the Constitution, been committed exclusively to the Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, the entire history of our country, its legislation, and judicial decisions supply ample proof that the legislative power of Congress stands upon equality with the powers of each of the other departments of the Government; that with respect to our domestic affairs the power and discretion of Congress is supreme; that the question of regulating our coastwise trade is a proper subject of legislation; that it is a matter with which foreign nations have no concern; that it is not international in its character.

In Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344) Mr. Justice White in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State laws concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against the British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that, because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination, whether domestic or foreign.

The language of the great Chief Justice is clear and to the point and bears directly upon the question raised with respect to the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It will be observed upon examination of the first neutralization rule that the evil guarded against is discrimination. In order that there may be discrimination, two distinct sets of conditions must exist. First, there must be two or more subjects similarly situated; and second, there must be two or more rules prescribed for their government; one, at least, of which is more favorable to one of the subjects than the others. Now, in the case at hand, as Mr. Justice White has said, there is no discrimination, because there are not two subjects similarly situated. One might as well say that a railroad discriminates merely because it charges a higher rate upon one class of goods than upon another or fixes a higher rate in their local tariffs than in their proportional or through tariffs.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who have preceded me have referred to the treaty of Washington of 1871, and to the action of the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada under article 27 of that treaty, and have claimed a precedent for Great Britain's interpretation of the treaty of 1901. Apparently adopting the argument of Senator ROOT in his speech delivered in the Senate January 21, 1913, it is contended that our interpretation of the treaty of 1871 estops us from now contending that the treaty of 1901 does not include American vessels, and especially American coastwise trade. In his speech referred to, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said:

> We are not without an authoritative construction as to the scope and requirements of an agreement of that description, because we have another treaty with Great Britain—a treaty which formed one of the great landmarks in the diplomatic history of the world, and one of the great steps in the progress of civilization—the treaty of Washington of 1871, under which the Alabama claims were submitted to arbitration. Under that treaty there were provisions for the use of the American canals along the waterway of the Great Lakes and the Canadian canals along the same line of communication upon equal terms to the citizens of the two countries.
> Some years after the treaty Canada undertook to do something quite similar to what we have undertaken to do in this law about the Panama Canal. It provided that while nominally a toll of 20 cents a ton should be charged upon the merchandise both of Canada and of the United States, there should be a rebate of 18 cents for all merchandise which went to Montreal or beyond, leaving a toll of but 2 cents a ton for that merchandise. The United States objected; and I beg your indulgence while I read from the message of President Cleveland upon that subject, sent to the Congress August 23, 1888. He says:
> "By article 27 of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion of Canada on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, and to also secure to the subjects of Great Britain the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States.
> "The equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion which we were promised in the use of the canals of Canada did not secure to us freedom from tolls in their navigation, but we had a right to expect that we, being American and interested in American commerce, would be no more burdened in regard to the same than Canadians engaged in their own trade; and the whole spirit of the concession made was, or should have been, that merchandise and property transported to an American market through these canals should not be enhanced in its cost by tolls many times higher than such as were carried to an adjoining Canadian market. All our citizens, producers and consumers as well as vessel owners, were to enjoy the equality promised.
> "And yet evidence has for some time been before the Congress, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that while the tolls charged in the first instance are the same to all, such vessels and cargoes as are destined to certain Canadian ports—
> Their coastwise trade—
> "are allowed a refund of nearly the entire tolls, while those bound for American ports are not allowed any such advantage.
> "To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional upon our vessels doing Canadian business instead of their own is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance."
> Upon the representations of the United States embodying that view, Canada retired from the position which she had taken, rescinded the provision for differential tolls, and put American trade going to American markets on the same basis of tolls as Canadian trade going to Canadian markets. She did not base her action upon any idea that there was no competition between trade to American ports and trade to Canadian ports, but she recognized the law of equality in good faith and honor; and to this day that law is being accorded to us and by each great nation to the other.

Here is an illustration of the misrepresentation that has been going on throughout the country with respect to this whole subject. By half truths and exaggeration the matter has been made to appear in a light entirely false. The case of Canada just referred to, when the whole truth is told, not only entirely fails as an authority to support Great Britain's position, but it serves as a direct authority to the contrary.

It will be noted that Senator ROOT said:

By article 27 of the treaty of 1871 provision was made to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland Canal.

And so forth.

Based upon this statement his whole argument of the case as a precedent is made. Now, the fact is the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871 made no such provision. Let me quote that article, Mr. Speaker:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

And so forth.

It will be observed that this article concluded no agreement whatever between Great Britain and Canada and the United States. By the terms of this treaty Great Britain merely "engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada," and so forth. The fact is that all of the parties to that treaty recognized that they were dealing with a matter which was a subject of legislation, both by Canada and the United States; and the truth is that, following the adoption of the treaty, the Dominion of Canada did legislate and the Congress of the United States legislated, and when the matter was concluded the commercial arrangement rested not upon the treaty of 1871, but upon the reciprocal legislation enacted by Canada and the United States, respectively.

Now, in as much as the matter rested upon reciprocal legislation, it existed and continued at the will of the respective parties. A treaty upon an international matter is theoretically perpetual. Legislation is always understood to be subject to repeal at any time by the legislative authority. When Canada undertook to discriminate against the people and the markets of the United States, she did so under authority of the Canadian Parliament, and the United States made no contention that she did not have the right so to do. The United States, however, did contend that when Canada changed her rule of treatment that we, under the reservation of the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, had the right to retaliate; and the United States proposed to do so. In the face of this retaliation the Government of Canada withdrew from her position, not because she had violated any treaty, because she was never a party to any treaty, but because she felt that it was to her advantage commercially to meet the demands of the United States; and deeming it so to her advantage, she pursued that course. As a matter of fact, even had the matter rested upon the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871, it would not have been an authority in favor of Great Britain's position now, but an authority against such position. It will be observed that under the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871 the stipulation was that the citizens of the United States should use these Canadian canals "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion." There is no ambiguity in this language. The rights of the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada was to be the measure of the rights of the inhabitants of the United States. But no such language occurs in the treaty now under consideration. Again, the twenty-seventh article of the treaty of 1871 and all legislation enacted in pursuance thereof had for its object the adjustment of commercial relations, not the establishment of a general principle of neutrality. The parties concerned at that time were dealing with subjects commercial and domestic, both to the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada. They therefore effected such adjustment in the proper way through the Parliament of Canada and the Congress of the United States. President Grant and the existing Senate did not assume the authority to perform the function of Congress on that occasion, but referred the matter to the appropriate department of government.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that a question of national honor is at stake. I am inclined to acknowledge the accuracy of this statement. The question of national honor, however, in my opinion does not rest upon the action of the Congress of the United States in 1912, but upon the proposed action of the Congress in 1914. I believe I am as jealous for the national honor of my country as any other man; but merely because there are those who have seen fit to raise a question of national honor, we should not hold lightly nor fail to maintain with firmness and dignity our own national rights in the premises. If the former President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, acting within the scope of the powers exclusively conferred upon the Executive by the Constitution, concluded a proper convention the obligations of which were violated by any provision of the law in question, I would not hesitate to make amends by a repeal of that law. But if a fair consideration discloses that we have violated no treaty obligation, but have acted fairly within our national rights upon a subject exclusively domestic, no implication, whether present or imminent, no method of coercion, however adroitly applied, will justify our supine submission to an unjust demand. The President, however, seems to entertain a different opinion, for he tells us "we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong," and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity. This is strange language coming from the Executive of a great Nation. It is strikingly unlike that which we might expect from a Washington, a Jefferson, a Lincoln, a Grant, or a Roosevelt. If I have read history aright, it was not their habit to yield to the demands of foreign powers without raising the question whether we were right or wrong. But possibly these great men were never confronted with "implications" as serious as those to which the President has referred. Just what these implications are we are not permitted to know. We are merely told that they involve matters of great delicacy and near consequence, and that unless we grant this request he will not know how to deal with them.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is quite possible that the President overestimates the gravity and extent of these implications. Supposing it is true that the present administration has had to consider an unpleasant controversy with Japan in California; supposing that the present complications in Mexico are all that they appear to be; supposing that a British subject has recently lost his life in that country under circumstances which render it embarrassing to the President and his Secretary of State; should Japan and Great Britain, her ally, be permitted to take advantage of these matters to force upon us the relinquishment of our sovereign rights over the Panama Canal? This is a question which the Congress of the United States should seriously consider before acknowledging. So far as I am concerned, I see no legitimate relation between the California and the Mexico questions and the interpretation of the treaty of 1901. The plain proposition is that we should yield our contention on the treaty matter; that we should reverse our position taken nine years ago; that we should acknowledge the rights of Great Britain, Japan, and every other nation to be equal to our own in the Panama Canal; and all this without raising the question as to whether we are right or wrong, in order that the President may know how to deal with these other so-called implications. In other words, we are to surrender unquestioningly not only our past attitude but our independent sovereignty over the canal as a consideration for the indulgence of Great Britain and Japan in connection with these other matters. So far as I am concerned, I shall never vote for any such a policy. In my opinion we have accorded and stand ready to accord Great Britain and every other friendly nation every right promised and every right to which they are justly entitled in the canal. For 50 years the nations of Europe trifled with the task of cutting through the Isthmus of Panama. The United States then undertook the task unaided and alone. We undertook it because we regarded a canal across the Isthmus as an American necessity. Under our constitutional right we acquired a cession of the Canal Zone from the Republic of Panama. At the cost of $400,000,000 we have completed the work. We have fortified the canal and set our flag at either entrance, and purpose to defend it against the nations of the world. Under these circumstances I am opposed to any policy calculated to share with any nation or nations the independent sovereignty of the United States over this great project.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALSH]. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it was my original intention during this momentous debate to occupy the position of an attentive listener—a student of the matter under consideration, seeking information to guide my own action when the time should come for casting my vote. But since the discussion has resolved itself to a great extent into a criticism of an individual, I feel in duty bound to enter into the debate, because the individual happens to be my most distinguished constituent, the President of the United States. [Applause.] Since the various phases of this question have been so thoroughly discussed pro and con by distinguished speakers I will only dwell upon the phase which I have indicated, namely, the criticism of the President. Now it is being chiefly urged against his request for the repeal of the tolls-exemption law that such a request on his part is a direct repudiation of a plank in the Democratic platform—a plank in favor of which he himself is on record as having spoken—and those who have been eagerly and anxiously watching and waiting for such an opportunity take advantage of his change of attitude to launch forth in bitter criticism of what they suppose to be the motives for the change.

Granted, gentlemen, that the President was formerly in favor of the exemption from tolls of our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal; granted that it was a plank in the Democratic platform and that he made a speech in favor of the law; the only justifiable inference that we can draw is that the arguments which influenced him to adopt and favor such a law must have been solid and convincing, for the slightest acquaintance with Woodrow Wilson is sufficient to convince anyone that he is not the type of a man who can be influenced by trivial arguments in favor of anything. And therefore in the mind of every sensible American citizen the change of attitude on his part will at once argue the existence of reasons which amply justify his position as being for the best and most permanent interests of the American people. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I have had the honor of knowing Woodrow Wilson personally and officially for a number of years. I had the privilege of serving in the New Jersey Legislature during his incumbency as governor, and I honored and respected him during his entire political career, for with my knowledge of the man I could not do otherwise. But let me tell you, sirs, I honor and respect him now more than ever, because he has had the courage—the jingo speeches of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] notwithstanding—he has had the courage and the honesty to reverse his former action on this question of tolls exemption, and has done so in the very teeth of the storm of criticism which he must have foreseen such action would arouse. [Applause.] For my part I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that, apart from my own reading of the treaty clause in question, apart from my study of the lengthy debate upon it in 1912, apart from the arguments advanced by distinguished speakers during the present debate, this very change of attitude by the President, since he became President, forms for me an additional and a most powerful argument influencing me to favor the repeal of the exemption law with my mind at ease and my conscience at rest. We must not lose sight of the fact that "party platforms" and "partisan politics" should not extend beyond the boundary lines of our country, and that as President of the United States he has had avenues of information and knowledge opened up to him concerning important, far-reaching, delicate, and necessary international relations which previously to a great extent had been as a closed book.

We can not as a Nation occupy a position of splendid isolation. That might have been possible in the far-distant past; but in these progressive days of the twentieth century, when the facilities for international communication and transportation have been so enlarged; in these days, when the volume of travel, both for business and pleasure, grows yearly by leaps and bounds, when by reason of such communication and travel the great bonds of human fellowship are being drawn closer and closer; in these days when, more, perhaps, than ever before, the blessings of universal peace seem possible of realization, we must take into consideration our relations as a Nation with the other great powers of the world. [Applause.] We want peace where peace can possibly be maintained without any sacrifice of national honor; we want our country to have the opportunity to develop along the lines of solid prosperity which the memorable legislation of this Congress has made possible; we want to give the vast and peace-loving army of our industrial toilers an opportunity to taste the blessings which are guaranteed them by the Constitution. Suppose Woodrow Wilson had come to the Capitol and said to you: "Gentlemen of the Congress, we must intervene with arms in a neighboring country," and asked for an appropriation of $300,000,000 of the people's money for purposes of war, instead of asking for the repeal of this exemption law in the interest of peace. I believe there are few of you who would go on record as opposing his request, even though you can not be ignorant of the terrible calamities, the long-drawn-out agony, the disruption of industrial life and prosperity, and the setback to national progress which must necessarily follow in the wake of even a successful war. But he does not ask you to put your hands into the pockets of the people for the millions of dollars which would only be the first sop in case of war, for if the exemption law is repealed it will put millions of dollars in the Public Treasury; he does not ask you to do anything which has been shown to be other than advantageous to the interests of our Nation; and yet there are those who will stamp their feet in indignation and hurl the hot shot of denunciation against the policies of this administration for the motives which they choose to fancy may underlie its attitude on the tolls question.

Ah, gentlemen, when I think of the millions of our citizens who are just beginning to reap the benefits of improved conditions and then look forward into a future which would follow for them close upon the heels of war, I hope and pray with all the powers of my heart and soul that the great God of peace may strengthen the hands of this administration and enable them to work out the solution of all difficulties by peaceful means, without dragging the people down through the deeps of the hell of war. For if it can succeed in doing this with honor, exercising the patience of conscious strength, President Wilson will have placed our country in an enviable position among the nations of the earth; will have given a new, a powerful impulse to the cause of universal peace; will have enshrined himself in the hearts of the American people, and "generations yet to come will call him blessed"; while the calamity howlings and criticisms, denunciations and jingoisms of the present hour will have sunk into the insignificance of the chattering of magpies. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, free tolls for coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal or equal tolls for all vessels using this great waterway, connecting the two great oceans, has become an acute question, and calls for the best judgment of each Member casting his vote as to him seems right and proper. As to my action, having voted against free tolls before, I find less difficulty now in casting my vote the same way at this time. I voted with the majority of my party in 1912, when the present law upon this subject was passed by Republican votes, and on the rule for the consideration of the repeal bill I voted with the great majority of my party with a majority of Republicans voting in opposition.

Section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that—

> The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Regardless of the construction and meaning put upon the lanlanguage of the treaty, and about which men may honestly differ as to whether the United States or Congress could grant free tolls to coastwise vessels without violating the terms of the treaty, it is my belief and judgment that all vessels using this canal, built at such enormous cost, should pay tolls and thus help to pay the expenses of the operation and maintenance of this great waterway.

I did not believe two years ago, nor do I believe now, that these coastwise vessels should be granted a subsidy in the way of free tolls and be thereby exempted from bearing their fair share of the necessary expenses for the use of this great waterway, built at so large an expense by all of the people of the United States. Why grant this special privilege of exemption to a great monopoly controlled coastwise trade? This coastwise trade is exclusively protected from all outside or foreign competition, granted benefits and protection thereby which are not given to other American vessels engaged in foreign trade, that must pay tolls on equal terms with foreign vessels. Why should the independent private-owned American vessels engaged in foreign trade using the canal be compelled to pay tolls and this great coastwise monopoly be granted an indirect subsidy out of the Treasury of the United States? If the granting of free tolls to American ships engaged in foreign trade be in violation of the treaty, then this Government is in honor bound to respect the terms of the treaty, and by deliberate act of Congress it has so written the present law; and in my judgment Congress should now require all American vessels using the canal to pay alike and repeal that part of the law granting free tolls to coastwise vessels.

If the granting of free tolls to coastwise vessels be in the nature of a subsidy, then it is in violation of the Democratic doctrine, oft repeated in Democratic platforms, of antagonism to ship subsidies, as well as in violation of that great American doctrine of "equal rights for all and special privileges to none." What excuse is there for granting this special favor or privilege to one class of shipowners, which has a monopoly of a rich trade? What reasonable excuse is there for giving this special privilege to these coastwise vessels, owned and operated by selfish interests already protected by law from all outside competition and now asking for the free use of the canal, while the Treasury and the people, having no interest or ownership in this trade monopoly, must bear a heavy burden resulting from the construction and incident to the use of the canal? Why subsidize our coast fleet, trust owned and monopoly controlled, in view of the Democratic doctrine of "equal rights for all and special privileges to none"?

And who are the owners of these already highly protected trade vessels? It is said that in the evidence at the hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee that it was shown that the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade were principally owned by the Standard Oil Co., the Steel Trust, and the Shipping Combine, and that by reason of the fact that foreign vessels can not enter into competition with them, they were the better able to levy excessive freight rates upon American products carried in their bottoms. That these trust-controlled vessels should help to pay for the use of the canal, relieving to that extent the Public Treasury, and not be granted by law this ugly form of graft, I am satisfied will be the judgment of the majority of the people of this great country. It has been well stated elsewhere that—

The coastwise toll-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act grants an unjustifiable subsidy. The taxpayers of the country who have paid for the Panama Canal are entitled to receive reasonable tolls from the individuals and corporations who use the canal and derive profit therefrom. When the general public clearly understands what is involved in exempting the owners and charterers of coastwise vessels from toll payments, it seems reasonably certain that the public will approve an amendment of the canal act of August 24, 1912, by striking out the toll-exemption clause.

These coastwise vessels, under the evidence presented to the committee, as I am told, levy excessive freight rates upon those who are compelled to use these vessels absolutely without any competition as between themselves, whether owned by one great interest or several interests, trading with a common understanding of not competing with each other. They do not compete between themselves, while they are freed from all outside competition. If certain benefits should come to a limited few on the two great coasts by reason of exemption from the payment of tolls as they ply their trade through this great waterway, why should the great body of the country bear this burden? Why given to coast cities without benefit to inland cities and sections? The trouble and just complaint has been that the coast sections and interests have been cared for lavishly, while the interior of the country has been neglected and borne the burden.

This canal has cost the American people nearly $400,000,000; the annual expense of operation and maintenance is estimated to be about $16,000,000 a year, omitting interest upon the cost of purchase and construction of the canal. It may be years before the canal will be self-supporting by reason of collection of tolls. The loss or shortage must be paid out of the Public Treasury. Why not have these rich shipowners lessen the shortage by the payment of reasonable tolls for carrying their rich cargoes through this great waterway?

Why compel, because of the terms of the treaty, American vessels carrying American products to foreign ports passing through the canal, in open competition with foreign vessels, to pay tolls and at the same time relieve from tolls the coastwise vessels, which ply their trade free from all foreign competition? Why make this free gift and thus subsidize an absolute monopoly and protected Shipping Trust, saved even without this gift from all competition, when their vessels fix their own excessively high and cruel rates without competition and without benefit to the general public? What just excuse have I to do other than to stand by my vote heretofore honestly cast with the majority of my party two years ago and to stand now with the majority of my party and with the President? What just excuse have I for discrediting the President at home and abroad by changing my vote at this time? I shall vote now as I did then, and abide the judgment of my constituents on this and other questions of great moment. This exemption seems to be in violation of a solemn treaty made by our country. It looks like an ugly subsidy in antagonism to oft-repeated Democratic platform declarations against ship subsidy. It is a special privilege to a trust combination of rich shipowners, already specially protected from outside competition, who do not compete with each other, because of trade agreements by which they levy excessive tolls or rates upon the public using coastwise trade vessels. It is in effect a gift or contribution from the Public Treasury of an estimated million dollars of annual canal tolls, needed to help pay the annual expense for the operation and maintenance of the canal—a free-tolls graft for a Shipping Trust, without benefit to the public, in violation of good morals, and without honest purpose.

The failure to pass this repeal bill will dishonor the Nation, rob the Public Treasury, discredit at home and abroad the President of the United States, whose honesty, sincerity of purpose, and patriotism no man, here or elsewhere, will question. The American public will not be caught by a false cry of patriotism raised in the interest of the greed and avarice of an ugly monopoly.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. POU). The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I presume you were all edified to have the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WALSH], who claims President Wilson as his constituent, and therefore the personal representative of the President on the floor of this House, characterize the patriotic utterances of the two great parties—Republican and Progressive—and a large section of the Democratic in opposing and criticizing this repeal measure as the "chattering of magpies." I had not up to this time criticized the President's course; but this semiofficial attack on the rights of Members here to freely debate is resented by every patriotic and red-blooded Member of this House. [Applause.]

Let me tell the personal representative to carry back to the White House as answer to its statement on March 5 that our right to exempt tolls "is not being debated outside of the United States," that it is being debated here in this body, which, with the Senate, constitute the only two bodies on earth which have the right to debate and determine this question or any other affecting our domestic rights. I would rather have this debate conducted by Speaker CLARK, Leaders MANN, MURDOCK, UNDERWOOD, KITCHIN, LENROOT, SHERLEY, ADAMSON, and all the splendid leadership of this House that alone has the sovereign right to determine than all the parliaments and chancelleries elsewhere throughout the world. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New Jersey says, referring to the President's reversal on the tolls question:

The change of attitude on his part will at once argue the existence of reasons which amply justify his position as being for the best and most permanent interests of the American people.

The Members of this House would have been pleased to have heard from their honored President what these reasons were. "That the President can do no wrong," has not yet become the settled policy of this country. The Member who is responsible to his constituents and his country and not to any other branch of the Government or member thereof is false to his duty if he accepts any man's position on any question, proper for his own determination, without knowing the controlling reasons therefor. He says, further:

That the arguments which influenced him to adopt and favor such a law must have been solid and convincing.

We know that those arguments were not domestic, because they have not been voiced by the American people, and the statement of the President that the question is not debated outside of this country, and knowing that it is being vigorously debated here now, warrants us in concluding the arguments were foreign. [Applause.]

We are warranted further in believing this when we recall that during the last campaign President Wilson, then a candidate, expressed his great reliance upon the London Times as a source of information. The London Times in an editorial commenting upon the message of March 5 said:

We recognize, of course, in the Eastern States, that a large and reputable minority discussed the issue from the broad standpoint of policy and good faith, but among the mass of Americans throughout the country the general feeling appears to be that the construction of the canal under American auspices with American money is a fact that outweighs all others.

Note the criticism by the great "Thunderer" upon the people who live in the interior of this country. It concedes a measure of wisdom to the eastern part of the United States, under the old thought that wisdom as well as wise men came from the East. I presume the full meaning of the allusion is that wisdom increased and intensified as it traveled eastward until it reached Greenwich, where our longitude begins and the "Thunderer" roars.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SLOAN. So far as I am concerned——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. I have not time to yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that the President was guided solely by foreign influence and did not have the interests of these United States in his breast?

Mr. SLOAN. I only know from circumstances and from what he has said and done. He has not unfolded to the American people where he obtained his information or from whom nor with whom he has advised. Before we bend to his will these things we would like to know, and we are unworthy to represent our people if we do not insist upon obtaining them. We are required by all the argument on that side of the House to accept the vague suggestions and hazy conclusions of the message entirely upon faith.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] asks us if we question the President's veracity or judgment. His veracity would relate to his correct statement of known facts. These have been studiously withheld from the House. As to his conclusions, which should be based upon well known and considered facts, and which constitute the bulk of the message, we would be less than men and far below the standard of statesmen if we accepted blindly and without full information on great questions affecting the welfare of our Nation the judgment of any man. Especially is this true when that judgment is the announcement of a complete reversal in opinion and policy where a minor economic practice and a great national right which may affect our national well-being in the ages to come are at stake. This is to be done in the light of memory that the same person had lucidly, cogently, and ably defended the former position with wealth of fact and argument, calculated to and having the effect of bringing great numbers of American people to his standard as a candidate for the highest office in the land. [Applause.]

Faith in presidential utterances will not preserve this Nation nor defend the prerogatives of this House; no more than faith during 400 years could effect the short water passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It will require exact and voluminous facts to convince the American people that the Panama Canal is not theirs to do with as they will, tolls or no tolls. It required works to remove the earth, pull down the mountains, chain the rivers, and build the lakes which merged the two great water bodies of the world.

It was a noble Roman in Rome's imperial day
Who heard a coward croaker before the castle say:
"They are safe in such a fortress; there is no way to shake it."
"On! On!" exclaimed the Roman, "I'll find a way or make it."

There was no way to be found. American genius, American treasure, American industry, American lives made the way, which ought to be as sacred to us as in the Roman day was the bridge across the Tiber. The Roman who would have proposed its surrender to the use and control of the Volscians and Etruscans would have been hurled from the Tarpeian Rock.

Once on a time three valiant Romans, to defend their bridge against the passage and aggression of the Roman soil by their ancient enemy, thrust their lives into the breach and held the bridge until the Roman people plunged it into the Tiber's flood. The three leaders of this House—Clark, Mann, and Murdock—have thrown themselves into the face of danger in the defense of this American way. The Americans would like to see it saved for American use and American control, but there are many patriotic people who would rather see that section of the Isthmus reduced to the condition in which it was during primeval chaos than to see it and its control surrendered by the people who built it to the people who refused to aid or build.

Whether we shall levy tolls upon American coastwise ships as a matter of economics is a question upon which there is straightforward difference of opinion in this country. Men say that it is a subsidy. It is not a subsidy in the strict sense of that word. But admit that it is a constructive subsidy; that it does grant a favor. How insignificant it is when compared to the subsidy of 5 per cent which the Underwood tariff bill grants the importation of all goods coming into this country in American bottoms. That in the course of a year or two would run into multiplied millions. How slight in comparison it is to the subsidy which is granted to all the shipping in all the lakes, rivers, and canals of this country which have been either dredged or harbored out of the American Treasury. How insignificant it is when compared with the subsidy which the same tariff bill grants to the farmers of Canada, Australia, Argentina, and the rest of the world in the admission at our ports of entry all their products to compete with the products of our western farms duty free. The remission of revenues in this particular will amount to 30 times what the item of tolls at the canal would be.

But that is but an incident to the great question here involved, which by the terms of this bill so construes our rights to the canal and our relations to Great Britain and all the other countries of the world for now and all future time, so that we can not say whether we shall levy tolls or not; whether, if we do levy the tolls, we may not give a slight advantage to an American shipper against what may be the shipping of our greatest national enemy or commercial competitor. More than this, there is involved in this the necessary implication that if we concede Great Britain's demand for a strained construction of our treaty with that country that we can not carry out our treaty with the Republic of Panama, which gives free passage to that country's ships. More than that, it involves our right to carry our own war vessels through the canal without payment of tolls. More than that, it involves our right, in case of war with any foreign country, to use the Panama Canal Zone for the harboring, victualing, and repairing our ships in time of war. All other belligerent nations' ships in time of war, whether they be at war with the United States or another country, must leave the canal and its harbors within 24 hours after its arrival. We would not be allowed to revictual nor to stay for any longer period than 24 hours, unless in distress, and then only for the absolutely necessary time. Voting for this measure votes away America's rights to protect itself and to use this great coign of vantage which we shall have in the day of our national peril. To vote for this involves a repudiation of our right to fortify and defend the canal. We have already expended $35,000,000 in fortifying it. As Baron Von Putlitz has well said, the Panama Canal should be the Gibraltar of America and should be ours.

A recognition of America's rights has been given by the negotiators of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, by the Senate which approved it, by Presidents Roosevelt and Taft in signing and construing it on various occasions, by Secretaries ROOT and Knox, and by the English foreign office as late as July 12, 1912. It never was seriously questioned until the speech was made by Senator ELIHU ROOT on a later date.

The Senate of the United States and House of Representatives by the passage of the present law then placed their construction thereon. In signing that bill President Taft construed that treaty in our favor. The great national Democratic Party, on July 21 at Baltimore, declared:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The Progressive Party declared—> that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

The Republican Party in its convention at Chicago made no specific statement; but the majority of its Members in the House and Senate voted for the present law and a Republican President, then its party candidate, approved it. A Democratic presidential candidate enthusiastically supported it. Notably in a speech delivered at Washington Park, N. J., August 15, 1912, he said:

> Now, there is another matter, you know we are digging a tremendous ditch across the Isthmus of Panama. It is predicted by the engineers in charge of that colossal enterprise that we shall be able to open it to the ships of the world by the year 1915. * * * Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provided for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. * * * Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. * * *

Moreover, I have it on personal authority from a great Democratic Senator, that every Democratic speaker sent throughout the East, West, and South in 1912 was instructed to dwell with special force and emphasis upon the stand which the Democratic Party had taken upon free tolls for coastwise travel. The reason given and which was given to thousands of audiences was that it gave competition throughout the country against the mighty transcontinental railroads, American and Canadian, which had opposed the canal building for 25 years. The result of that campaign is a matter of history. I have read the political platforms of all the great parties; and taken together with the conduct of the representatives of the then party in power, no one issue seemed more universally agreed upon and settled in the clearest and most concise and unmistakable terms than that free tolls were to be granted United States coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal.

I had voted purely on the economic view of that question two years ago for the imposition of tolls. The right to impose them while mooted by one or two was conceded by nearly everybody. Had the American people not spoken so clearly after our right had been challenged and had the question again been presented in such a light as to vindicate our right to impose tolls or to release our coastwise shipping from them, I should again probably vote for the imposition of tolls. But the mandate of the people was interposed against this measure. Almost transcending that then is involved our right to do or not to do this act which will symbolize our sovereignty or evidence our abdication of control of the canal. Against these two major considerations, the minor one must be subject and stand aside.

A great many Members desired to express themselves on the economic feature of this bill. This was denied them in the rule known as the "gag rule," which was introduced to govern consideration of the bill. This rule limited the time for debate and expressly forbade the offering of any amendment. There were many who would have been willing to have voted for imposition of tolls if the bill could have been amended so that the right to impose or exempt from tolls had been reserved and stated.

During the progress of the discussion of this bill the Secretary of State gave to the press a statement approving of the cloture rule, which cut off the right of amendment. Why this should have been done is not well understood. That Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for British foreign affairs, might desire to have the cloture rule applied we can well understand; but why our own Secretary of State should have anything to say about the course of Members or the conduct of the affairs of the House of Representatives in this particular is difficult to understand. I have a great admiration for the distinguished Secretary of State, and of his many attractive qualities, but I can not agree with him or go with him upon this proposition, because it involves being dragged with him at the wheels of Sir Edward Grey's triumphant diplomatic car. [Applause.]

An alleged nonfulfillment by the Republicans of their tariff pledge made in 1908, together with the passage of "gag rules" in the House, were the principal causes in sweeping that party from power. Certainly strange it is that this administration in one measure should combine those two distasteful and abhorrent acts which the American people will not regard as a vice by Republicans and a virtue by Democrats.

The interference of a branch of the administration with the free action of the membership of this House comes in the story of the little page on the Democratic side who noticed the frequent telephone calls from the House to the Post Office Department, asked in derision, "Are they trying to carry this tolls bill through by parcel post?" [Laughter.] That was a more healthful pleasantry by this little House page than the one alleged to have been made by that other Page at the recent London banquet, in which he said:

The Monroe doctrine, you know, meant only this: That the United States would prefer that no European Government should gain more land in the New World. In those days the only way in which a foreign Government could gain land was literally to go and take the land. Now we have more refined methods of exploitation, and there are other ways of taking it. That is the only protest that the United States has ever whispered, and it has only whispered it.

This House of Representatives should not yield its prerogatives of independent legislation to any President or Cabinet members, now or hereafter, no matter to what political party they may belong. Criticism has been made of the British Government and of British diplomacy. In this I do not join. For each I have a great admiration. But the more I admire them the less I would feel like doing their wishes. Neither ever lose sight of British interests. For the Government—which is really the House of Commons—I have the utmost admiration for its sturdy loyalty and insistence upon being the real governing body of the United Kingdom. Recently Britain's King slightly interested himself in matters relating to legislation pending in Parliament. No sooner was it discovered than a tremendous protest rose from the members of the House. John Ward, standing in heroic attitude, with clenched fist, said:

What we demand is that we shall exercise the right to legislate, without the interference of the King or army.

Following that, the press tells of long-continued demonstration of approval unprecedented in the history of Parliament. The King, alarmed, sought a scapegoat, and he was soon found, otherwise within a short time his crown might have gone to the melting pot and his throne taken place among "old chairs to mend."

I hope to see the day when this House shall be restored to its original primacy in legislation—that primacy which called John Quincy Adams, after retiring from the Presidency, into its membership rather than to a seat in the Senate or upon the bench. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that you may be the instrument to lead this House back to its original independence and sturdy self-assertion, so that it will be considered the bulwark of the people's rights and the fortress for our national prerogatives; in that day men will strive for honorable leadership in this House rather than aspire to become messenger boys for the White House. [Applause.]

In many important newspapers we are told that those who opposed this measure in good faith will not be retaliated upon by the Executive. For this there should be much thanks. But we are given to understand, through the press and by evident actions upon this floor, that our great Speaker is to be disciplined and punished.

Must Trelawney suffer? Must Trelawney die?
Then 40,000 Cornishmen will know the reason why.

Let me say, Must our Speaker suffer and must he politically die? Then a hundred million Americans will demand the reason why. [Applause.]

Let me tell you, sirs, that neither the Speaker nor any other man—Democrat, Republican, or Progressive—who sees fit to throw his political life and fortune in favor of his own country, mayhap it be against his party, is in danger; in fact, there is no more danger than on Friday morning, when the Georgia humming bird, from his safety here in the valley, so viciously assailed the grand old Missouri eagle in yon proud crag. [Applause.]

We are told that we should do this thing. The President says we ought to reverse our action without raising question whether we were "right or wrong." No man should reverse his favorable action or attitude toward his own country without seriously questioning whether it be right or wrong; nor should he reverse it against the interests of his country without potent, convincing, controlling, and compelling reasons. As for me, if there be doubts, I shall resolve them in the interests of my country and not in the interest of the foreign claimant. We are given to understand that our rights have been determined adversely by foreign tribunals. If we were to accept their determination, might we not also demand that their determination upon the value of that foreign policy, which the President proposes to preserve by that sacrifice, be likewise accepted?

I have read with a great deal of diligence and with some feeling the uniform adverse criticism of all the great nations. If that foreign policy which is to be saved at such an awful price is approved by one, I failed to see or learn of its existence. Should we, then, be required to sacrifice a right supported by the best thought of America because the foreigners think that right untenable, remembering that they also agree that the foreign policy which is to be saved by such a sacrifice is indefensible?

It has been suggested that there is a crisis before the country. This the President denies. There is no question that the American people, and especially this House, would stand by its President in any great national crisis. Our doubts would all be resolved in his favor, as they ought to be by him and all others in favor of our own country. In a real crisis the American support of the Nation will be simply measured by American ability. The country is not prepared to admit that there is any crisis. A crisis would find poor excuse at this time, because, when there was a transfer of the administration to the present incumbent, we were in the state of stable peace with all the world. More than that, the last administration had negotiated broad and binding treaties of peace with all the great nations of the earth, the adoption of which would have practically precluded any great national conflict for years to come. The country would hear with little patience of a great crisis, remembering that the adoption of those treaties was defeated by the Senators belonging to the now President's party.

Much has been said about the breach or observance of party platforms. We of the minority have done our full duty when we have challenged the country's attention to the proposed reversal of the Baltimore convention pledge. The Republican Party is out of power now because it was alleged that it had not lived up to a particular plank of its platform. If this action is taken, there will be no room for debate as to the repudiation of the platform. The binding effect of platforms has been given by our President in his Washington Park speech; it has been stated by our Secretary of State, who, we understand, wrote the major portion of the Baltimore platform and supervised the assembling of all of it. He stated as follows:

If a man after election finds that his platform contains something which he can not honestly support, what ought he to do? * * * He should resign and let the people select a man to do what they would have him do. * * * A platform is binding upon every honest man.

The binding effect of a platform is further stated by Mr. HENRY, chairman of the Rules Committee, who presented and urged the passage of the rule upon which this debate is proceeding, which in itself is a repudiation of a principle upon which a Democratic Congress was elected in 1910. Mr. HENRY said:

A party that violates its platform pledges is unworthy, and deserves the scorn of honest men. * * * When my party acts, whether its action be right or wrong, so long as I remain a member thereof I shall steadfastly support its platform demands.

The first section of the Baltimore platform provides, among other things:

The Republican Party * * * having been faithless to its pledge of 1908 it should no longer enjoy the confidence of the Nation.

Following that statement, in another section:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The final section of that same platform is:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

In the light of these expressions I submit no further comment; but gentlemen on that side of the House will hardly expect an American electorate to be equally merciful.

In the extraordinary procedure adopted to force this bill through the House at the will of powers outside of it there is involved the integrity, independence, and perpetuity of this body. That the representative of any constituent, whether he be hod carrier or President, should stand on the floor of this House and denounce the opposition to a measure as the "chattering of magpies" is worthy of consideration, and should elicit a warning to those who might in the future so offend.

Perhaps no trend or phase of thought was more distinctly emphasized in the framing of our fundamental law or finds more frequent expression in the text of that great instrument than that the Government was to be impersonal, one of fixed law, and not of transient sentiment. In the debate of the founders, when it was suggested that the exalted patriotism of Government officials would prevent error, fraud, or abuse, the response was unequivocal that it was wiser to create a barrier against these evils than to trust to the possible weakness, self-interest, or selfish ambition of any one man or set of men. At different periods in our history public men, thinking to pander to a popular craze or to ingratiate themselves with their leaders, have suggested a standard for official action other than that of constitutional guidance. "The higher law" was at one time exploited by the conscience of New England, but, while tolerated by the private citizen, no Executive dared to recognize it. Recently in the West a distinguished Cabinet officer of the present administration from the East declared that the President of the United States has a master, and that that master is his conscience. While I honor the incumbent of the presidential office and have confidence in his patriotism, I regard that declaration as at least a novel one. The American people believe that the Constitution of the United States is the supreme and only master of all officials of their Government from the highest to the lowest. They do not object to the exercise of conscience within legitimate limits, but do object to the undue preponderance of the personal element. They maintain that the Constitution represents the composite, crystallized conscience of the fathers, and that their Chief Executive is to be ruled and guided by it. He is sworn to administer the Government, not according to his conscience, but according to the collective will of the people as set forth in the laws of the land.

On the 4th of March, 1913, under a sky as bright as any that ever beamed upon a successful presidential candidate 200,000 people gathered in front of the great Capitol at Washington for the inaugural ceremonies. There were present the Supreme Court of the United States, Senators and Representatives, the incoming and outgoing Cabinets, governors of States, and diplomats of the world. The carriage of state, unattended by any show of military strength, brought thither the two most distinguished citizens of the Republic—President Taft and President-elect Wilson—the former seated to the right and the latter to the left. The oath of office, administered by the Chief Justice of the United States, pledged the President-elect to be guided not by his conscience but by the Constitution of the United States. A brief inaugural was delivered, and as the carriage of state returned whence it came President Wilson occupied the right-hand side and the ex-President the left; thereby signifying the change of the depository of power and that the will of a hundred million of people had been carried into effect without the loss of a life or the shedding of a drop of blood. I regarded the spectacle as the most sublime I had ever witnessed, and could not forbear contrasting it with the conditions that attend a change of administration in the unfortunate Republic to the south. With a constitution almost as fair and liberal as our own, the advent of a new President has been made in the smoke of revolution and at the point of the sword. I recalled that each of the recent rulers of that southern Republic—Diaz, Madero, and Huerta—declared that he was guided by his conscience in ruling his people. In our country the transfer from the jurist President to the scholar President conveyed a like grant of power, but the contrast between unfortunate, war-ridden, impoverished Mexico and rich, powerful, buoyant America emphasized the fact that our rulers are governed by the Constitution and the law; that ours is an impersonal form of government; that while personal conscience may counsel and suggest action it can not subordinate the will of the people, which is the supreme guide.

And finally we are asked to surrender our control of the canal to obtain support for a foreign policy which we have supported because our President was pursuing it; that when it is criticized by foreign powers we gave those criticisms no countenance, although our reason could not approve. To aid him in pursuing his duty as he saw it, we suppressed much of our convictions and stifled the objections which pressed for utterance. But when it comes not to merely following and supporting him in his duty as conceived by him, but at his request to surrender the rights and privileges of the Nation for now and hereafter which it is our own duty to defend, to that I can not yield.

When, on the 5th of March, 1914, the President asked us to make this surrender, 500 Senators and Representatives before him felt a loss of American pride, a decline of American spirit. The feeblest response was given him which he has received from that joint body since his inauguration. A yielding it meant to all. A yielding of our full right to control of the Panama Canal, in order that there might be accomplished a mere change of rulers in Mexico. I then recalled my visit to Panama. On New Years Day, 1913, in company with Senator POINDEXTER, of Washington, keeping well within the early shade on the Pacific side, we climbed Mount Ancon, until upon its narrow summit we stood and saw the glorious sunset in the west. That west which, by reason of the peculiar geography of the Isthmus, was over the Atlantic. It was the evening of the day, the dawn of the year, and the full sunrise of the twentieth century. Looking backward, we saw the world's greatest water bathed in the soft light of the sinking sun and we marveled not that upon right every tongue of whatever tribe or race had given it name significant of peace. To our right we saw Tobago Island, where our hospitals are. There the shade, and breeze, and pleasant waters give fevered brow and wounded limb their healing balm. To our left rose out of the ocean our fortified islands where ammunition chambers have been mined and filled. There frowning guns were being placed and all the enginery of defense was being assembled to tell the world our sovereignty at the Pacific gate.

We were not far from where Balboa saw, just 400 years before, the western sea, near where he waded into its waters, proclaiming all the lands whose shores it washed under the dominion of Spain; not far from there Sir Francis Drake, from a lofty treetop, saw Pacific's wave and claimed its touching land for England, though Sir Edward Grey was not foreign minister then.

Looking Atlanticward our eyes followed the electric lights which burst out as twilight faded, tracing the course of the great canal to a point where stupendous locks marked the beginning of that body of water which had been a river, but which had been seized, chained, and made a lake to bear the burdens of commerce. We saw there in prospect, but two years removed, the fleets of the earth bearing merchandise and men through this man-made path from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We thought and spoke of Columbus, his ambitions, discouragements, hardships, disappointments, partial achievement, neglect, ingratitude of friends, his chains and death, with the waterway to India unachieved. We spoke of Drake, Balboa, Cabot, Gilbert, and their accomplishments, but always the great purpose unfulfilled. We thought of the dream of navigators long unrealized, the hope of commerce disappointed, the ambition of kings thwarted, until our countrymen, knowing there was no way, made one. Again, looking Pacificward and far to the left, we could see the site of old Panama in 1671, a city of 30,000 souls, and we recalled how it had been ruthlessly assailed, captured, burnt, and destroyed, its treasure looted, its men slain, its women ravished. Few stones are left upon each other to mark the achievement of that early civilization or evidence the awful work of Henry Morgan, that English buccaneer, who seemed to have had the countenance of his own Government, for upon his return to England he was knighted for the havoc he had wrought in that part of the New World.

Then we looked below and saw the brilliant lights of new Panama, whose modern paved streets, excellent sewer system, and sanitary condition, all the work of the new Republic, under the tutelage and direction of the United States and its representatives at the Isthmus. We were glad that new Panama, standing out upon a peninsula embraced by a bay, said to be as fair as Naples, was the product of our country, while old despoiled Panama was the work of that other country which to-day, without expenditure and without right, is seeking to control this mighty engineering triumph of the ages; a work achieved over menace of pestilence and disease, through engineering work which moved mountains, captured rivers, and expended multiplied millions; a work whose magnitude and importance to mankind had paled into insignificance the great Chinese wall, the mighty pyramids, and every other work upon which genius had pondered, men labored, and treasury been expended.

Pardon the pride, overlook the glance of triumph and swell of chest. Proud moments for us, humble representatives of the two legislative bodies, given by the people the right to control this crowning achievement, control of which we are asked now by this act to relinquish as the difference in value between the hell hound Huerta and the villanous Villa. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is recognized.

THE POLICY OF EXEMPTION.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, two years ago I voted against this tolls exemption of our coastwise shipping principally on economic grounds. At that time Great Britain had made no protest. I knew that our coastwise trade was a monopoly. I knew that foreign vessels were by law excluded from it, and I knew that it needed no special favors. I did not and do not believe that the steamship companies would lower rates on account of any exemption which we might give them, so I voted against exemption. I should just as quickly vote to relieve our coastwise steamships from the payment of taxes as to relieve them from the payment of tolls in the canal. Why should not these great companies pay their share of the cost of maintenance and operation? Why should that additional burden be placed on the taxpayer?

"All that may be true," perhaps you say, "and yet if you exempt the American steamships from tolls will you not lower freight rates between the Atlantic and the Pacific and so create competition with the railroads and benefit the consumer?" Undoubtedly, if the steamship companies reduce their rates to the shippers to the extent of the toll exemption, and if the shippers pass on the reduction to the consignees, and the consignees hand it over intact to the millers and the jobbers and the warehousemen, and if all these wholesalers refuse to allow themselves any profit from the reduced rates, and if the retailers are equally virtuous, then each ultimate consumer will receive his share of the benefit of the reduction of $1.20 per ton in the cost of navigating an American steamship from an Atlantic port to a Pacific port.

There might be some sense in exempting our foreign shipping. What we have left of it is poor and struggling. Instead of that, if you please, we exempt our snugly prosperous coastwise vessels which are already guarded from competition.

TREATIES.

The more I have to do with treaties the less I like them. Unless I am very much mistaken, every diplomatist who draws a treaty sprinkles in a few indefinite clauses to cover anything which he may have forgotten to specify or may be unable to foresee. As both parties do the same thing, there is usually a good deal to be said on either side of any unforeseen question which happens to arise under a treaty drawn by experienced diplomatists.

Drafting a treaty between two European powers is mere child's play as compared with drafting a treaty to which the United States is a party. Two-thirds of our Senate must ratify each treaty. Mr. Chairman, there are 96 Members of the United States Senate. Can you contemplate with equanimity the horrible task of so wording a treaty that each of 64 Senators can find in its text the exact provision which he wants?

That is the trouble with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It was drawn in such a way as to insure its ratification. Nothing else mattered much. The point was that the canal needed building and we needed a new treaty before we could build it. No one stayed awake at night wondering what would happen when the canal was completed and it became necessary to interpret the treaty. The fact is that nobody cared very much. Yet, here we are face to face with the problem and good lawyers are divided in their opinion.

I do not expect, Mr. Chairman, that we can demolish all the arguments of our opponents who favor tolls exemption. Neither do I expect that we can prove all the contentions on our side. What we shall accomplish, if my enthusiasm has not misled me, is this: We shall demolish many more arguments than our opponents will demolish. We shall prove many more contentions than our opponents will prove.

ARBITRATION PREFERRED.

The British Government has protested that under the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 we are not permitted to exempt any American vessels from the payment of tolls unless the same exemption is extended to the vessels of the world. On February 27, 1913, Great Britain offered to arbitrate the question. Personally, I think that we ought cordially to have accepted this proposal of Great Britain, and that we ought to have consented to arbitration, either under a special arrangement or under the provisions of the arbitration convention of 1908. Secretary Knox held that the question was not ripe for arbitration—at all events without a special arrangement—until some British vessel should protest against the payment of an unequal toll. Whether President Wilson does or does not hold the same opinion as Secretary Knox has never appeared. Be this as it may, the President has decided that equitable behavior demands the repeal of the exemption which, in the Panama Canal act, we extended to our coastwise trade. It is, of course, possible that President Wilson may at heart prefer arbitration; but arbitration would require the consent of two-thirds of the Senate. Many people think that no such consent could be obtained prior to the opening of the canal; yet everyone will admit the soundness of the words of James Bryce. No Englishman ever more sympathetically understood the nature of our fellow countrymen. This is what Mr. Bryce said:

> Better also that when vessels begin to pass through the great waterway, in whose construction all the world has been interested, there should be left subsisting no cause of difference which could prevent any other nation from joining without reserve in the satisfaction the people of the United States will feel at the completion of a work of such grandeur and utility.

So much for the question of arbitration. It is not the subject which we are discussing. The question before us is the bill to repeal the clause in the Panama Canal act under which we discriminate in favor of our fellow countrymen in the matter of canal tolls.

THE FORBIDDING CLAUSE OF THE TREATY.

Those of us who believe that we have denied ourselves, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the right to discriminate in favor of our own vessels, base our case on the language of the first rule in article 3 of the treaty, as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

I am not a lawyer, which, perhaps, gives me an advantage when I am faced with the necessity of interpreting plain English. Tolls are "charges of traffic"; so it seems to me that this article in the treaty forbids any discrimination whatever between foreign vessels and our own in the matter of tolls. Those who would disagree with me in the assertion that the meaning of this clause is plain, base their contention on two different grounds.

WHAT THE OTHER SIDE CLAIMS.

Many men, and among them able lawyers, maintain that the words "all nations" in this clause are not to be construed as including the United States. Others contend that the words "vessels of commerce," in the sense in which they are used in this same clause, are not intended to cover our own coastwise vessels.

The position taken by those who believe that tolls exemption for our coastwise trade is within our rights may, in my opinion, be reduced to the following short statement:

First. By our treaty with Panama, in 1903, the Government ships of that country are exempt from the payment of tolls. Therefore, it is argued, the words "all nations" in the treaty with Great Britain could not have been intended to include Panama, but must be held to relate to all other nations except the United States and Panama.

Second. Article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty declares that the United States is to "have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction"—construction of canal—"as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." Therefore, as our opponents argue, the United States has the privilege of discriminating in favor of her own vessels, inasmuch as such discrimination would be one of the "rights" referred to in article 2.

Third. It appears that in the treaty of 1815 between Great Britain and the United States there was an agreement to the effect that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Now, our Supreme Court, in the case of Olsen v. Smith, held that a certain local discrimination with respect to pilotage in favor of American coastwise shipping was not a violation of this treaty. Consequently it is argued that if the words "vessels of the United States" in the treaty of 1815 did not include our coastwise shipping, then it must be evident that similar words in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should not be held to include our coastwise shipping.

Fourth. The fact is pointed out, as an evidence that Great Britain did not until recently take umbrage on account of the discrimination provided by the canal bill in favor of our coastwise vessels, that on July 8, 1912, the British chargé d'affaires, Mr. Innes, in a letter to the Secretary of State used these words:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

It must be admitted that Mr. Innes's note, carefully guarded though it be, does not improve the British case, although it has no effect on the main question of our rights under the treaty.

Fifth. It is held that this canal ought to be considered part of the coast line of the United States and should be treated as a harbor improvement. This contention is made in spite of the fact that the canal is made an international waterway by three treaties and in spite of the fact that we charge our foreign shipping tolls for the use of the canal.

Sixth. The fact that warships are coupled with vessels of commerce in the clause of the treaty which demands equal tolls for the vessels of all nations is held to be evidence that the United States never intended that this country should be included in the definition of the words "all nations." "Obviously," say our opponents, "the United States did not contemplate any such absurdity as charging tolls to her own vessels of war."

OUR ANSWER.

To say that we "granted" to Panama an exemption from tolls for her ships shows an entire misapprehension of the situation. The situation was this: Panama retained free tolls for herself as her privilege when she "granted" to us the treaty right to the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land for canal purposes. We had no inherent right to that Canal Zone except under such terms as Panama approved, and Panama imposed a condition of free tolls for herself before she would sign the treaty.

As a matter of fact, everyone knows that for half a century the policy of Great Britain and the United States required, and it was so provided by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that neither country should have exclusive control over a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, but that if any canal should be built all nations should be admitted on exactly equal terms. It is claimed that this policy was overturned when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was substituted for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It is said by our opponents that the United States became, as it were, a grantor of rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that none of the restrictions in that treaty were meant to apply to our own country. This doctrine can hardly stand examination for a minute. In rule 2 of article 3 appears this clause:

The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Why should the treaty specifically grant the United States this liberty if it were true that the restrictions in the rule did not apply to the United States as well as to foreign nations? If it be true that the United States by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty entirely released itself from the obligations as to equality of tolls imposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, what is the meaning of the clause in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which provides for the construction of the canal under the direction of the United States Government "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention"? Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provides that all the world shall have equal treatment as to tolls in any canal or railway to be constructed across the Isthmus by way of Tehuantepec or Panama. How can it be argued, in view of the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that the provision for neutralization in the former treaty had been so modified as to permit discrimination?

CONTEMPORARY EVIDENCE.

It is worthy of note that when the treaty was before the Senate in December, 1901, Senator Bacon proposed to strike from the preamble the words "without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." This proposal of Senator Bacon's was voted down. In other words, the treaty-making power refused to abandon the neutrality principles embodied in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

As to the contention that our Government under article 2 is entitled to establish discriminating tolls because such an act comes under the head of "the rights incident to such construction," as a matter of fact article 2 itself provides that such rights are to be "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." Senator Bacon endeavored to have the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty" stricken out, but his proposal was voted down. Clearly, then, our rights must be held to be subject to the rules contained in the present treaty, and the most important rule in article 3 is that which I quoted earlier in this address, to wit, the rule which requires conditions or charges of traffic to be on terms of entire equality for all the world. It is to be noticed that Senator Bacon also tried to strike out all the rules which were adopted under article 3, but was unable to accomplish his purpose. As further evidence of the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty at the time of its adoption, let me read a passage from Secretary Hay's note in transmitting the draft to the Senate:

The general principle of neutralization and equality has always been insisted upon by the United States, and it has recognized in this way the justice of the request of Great Britain on condition that she surrendered important national and material interests in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Now, what were these requests of Great Britain? Let us see what the press said at the time. After the treaty was ratified by the Senate the Washington Post, on December 17, 1901, said:

Great Britain asked this Government not to discriminate in the matter of tolls and to guarantee the neutrality of the canal as against belligerents, both of which requests were granted.

ARE COASTWISE SHIPS "VESSELS OF COMMERCE"?

I now take up the Supreme Court decision in Olsen v. Smith, on which the opposition relies in endeavoring to prove that the treaty meaning of "vessels of commerce" does not include coastwise ships. It is probable that gentlemen who lay great stress on this decision have not examined carefully all the provisions of the treaty of 1815, which was the treaty involved. By its terms that treaty regulated international commerce and not local commerce, and, moreover, it precisely provided that the commerce of the continent of North America and the West Indies "shall not be affected by any provision of this article, and that each party shall remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse." There was also a clause in the treaty making foreign commerce subject to the laws of our country. The pilotage regulation, which was complained of as a discrimination, can not without a violent distortion of logic be held to be anything except a local law not affected by the treaty.

I need hardly point out that a decision by our Supreme Court, even in a case actually parallel with the question of tolls exemption, would not deprive Great Britain of the right to an interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by an international arbitration tribunal.

THE LAYMAN'S OPINION.

After all, whatever lawyers may think, the average man feels that the intentions of those who drafted and ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be taken into account in deciding whether or not it was contemplated that the United States should have special privileges in the matter of tolls. The text of the treaty itself roundly declares that "all nations" must be treated alike in the matter of traffic charges. What good reason, or even far-fetched reason, can be found to offset the apparently plain English of the treaty? I have already quoted from Secretary Hay's note transmitting the treaty to the Senate. He advances the view that the United States is pledged to equality in the canal. I have also invited attention to Senator Bacon's motions, which were defeated on December 16, 1901. The Senator's amendments were designed for the express purpose of exempting the United States from the restrictions of the treaty. Yet they were defeated. In view of all that, can any man heartily declare his belief that the United States was not included in the expression "all nations"?

THE FAMOUS BARD AMENDMENT.

If it was really intended that we should have the right to discriminate in favor of our coastwise shipping, it would have been easy enough to insert a clause giving us that right. Instead of which a clause providing for that very privilege was rejected.

Pending the first ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Senator Bard, of California, on December 18, 1900, offered the following amendment to article 3:

The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment was negatived by a vote of 43 to 27. This vote would seem to the ordinary man to be the equivalent of the rejection of Senator Bard's proposal that we should have the right to exempt our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls. They could not write the Bard amendment into the treaty in 1900 so they have been trying to read it into the treaty ever since. "But," say the advocates of toll exemption, "Senator Bard's amendment was voted down because Senators at the time thought it superfluous and believed that the right to discriminate was indisputably included in the treaty just as it stood, even without the Bard amendment. To prove this contention, the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and others have gathered together quotations from letters which were written a dozen years after the occurrence by a few of the Senators who were here at the time the treaty was ratified.

Most of the Senators, by the way, appear to miss the point at issue. Mr. Speaker, do you think that the memories of those old gentlemen can be accurate as to the reasons which prompted their colleagues to negative an amendment one dozen years ago? Of course their memories can not be accurate. Only two years ago we Members of this House voted on this very same exemption matter. Yet it is a notorious fact that we have been flocking in laughable numbers to the Library to find out on which side of the question we are recorded. Not only do we fail to remember the reasons why any of our colleagues voted one way or the other, but, strange to say, we can not, without looking at the RECORD, recall how we voted ourselves. Much less can we tell what line of thought led us to our conclusion. Yet the tolls amendment which we adopted two years ago created infinitely more comment than the Bard amendment in 1900. How, then, can these aged Senators have retained a clear recollection all these years? As a matter of fact, do you really suppose that the Senate a dozen years ago seriously thought that the treaty clearly and beyond peradventure of a doubt gave us any discriminating rights at all? I wish that somebody would point out the clause which does it.

THE RECORD MADE AT THE TIME.

I can hardly think that evidence gathered at this late day can compete for a minute either with the plain record of the case or with deductions clearly to be drawn from the newspaper attitude toward the Bard amendment at the time that amendment was acted upon.

The fact of the matter is that when the Bard amendment was proposed all the newspapers were discussing the question of the fortification of the canal, and practically nothing else connected with the treaty. The whole treaty question, by the way, had a hard struggle to obtain from the press a small modicum of space, sandwiched in between portentous accounts of the hazing of Cadet Booz at West Point and the kidnaping of young Mr. Cudahy in Omaha.

However, I found in the San Francisco Examiner of December 19, 1900, a dispatch, from which I submit the following extract:

If an amendment offered to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in executive session by Mr. Bard, of California, to-day prevails, this Government will officially declare that the Isthmian Canal is a part of the coast line of the United States and subject to such restrictions and limitations as the United States may see fit to impose. The principle sought to be established is far-reaching in its effect, and, as Mr. Bard presented it, is as follows:

"Nothing contained in this treaty shall be construed to operate against the right of the United States to establish discriminating tolls in favor of American ships carrying American goods and engaged in the coastwise trade."

Mr. Bard said he would ask a vote on the amendment next Thursday when the other amendments come up for consideration. There was no discussion on the amendment.

James Creelman, the correspondent of the Hearst papers, declared that the friends of the Pacific railway monopoly were fighting the Bard amendment on the ground that it would "destroy the guaranty of peace neutrality." Not a word about the substance being already in the treaty.

The London Times of December 21, 1900, contained the following:

No sooner is it put about in Washington that Lord Pauncefote makes light of the pending amendments than more offensive ones are devised. He must be given something that he will object to. Obviously, in this spirit was offered the amendment of Senator Bard, of California, to levy discriminating tolls on foreign shipping using the Isthmian Canal. The idea is to make it absolutely certain that England will not agree.

Except what I have read you, all that I can find in the newspapers at the time is the mere mention of the text of the Bard amendment and the fact that it was voted down. Not one word in one of the newspaper notices leads to the belief that there was any discussion at the time which would justify the assertion that the Bard amendment was voted down largely because it sought to provide a power which already existed in the treaty.

WHAT THE NEW YORK JOURNAL SAID.

I think it is true that a year later than the defeat of the Bard amendment, when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was finally ratified, Senator Spooner declared his belief that we were not debarred from discriminating in favor of our coastwise trade. At least such was the report in the press at the time. The New York Journal went so far in an editorial in December, 1901, as to claim that the principle was settled that we had the right to demand discrimination in favor of our coastwise vessels. As against that claim, let me invite your attention to the following editorial of the New York Journal of December 21, 1900, the day after the Bard amendment was rejected:

It is possible that before the canal has been open very long we may decide to pay the cost of operation out of our National Treasury and let our vessels go through free of tolls, as the State of New York does with the Erie Canal. In that case, we shall be bound to let England's ships go through free as well.

WAR-VESSEL TOLLS.

It is true, as has been pointed out by those who take the opposite side, that article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides for terms of entire equality for vessels of war as well as vessels of commerce. From that circumstance it has been argued that the United States is exempt from the rules provided in the treaty, inasmuch as it is inconceivable that we ever contemplated charging tolls to our own war vessels. I admit that it would be absurd for us to charge tolls to our own war vessels. If we did so, of course there would be no actual payment of money. We should, however, debit the account of the Navy and credit the account of the canal with the amount of tolls which our warships might pay. It is quite conceivable, however, that at any time we may contemplate granting free passage in times of peace to warships of other nations. In fact, if such a proposition were before the House to-day, I should vote for it, inasmuch as I believe that in times of peace the Hay-Pauncefote treaty requires us to treat foreign war vessels passing through the canal exactly as we do our own.

SUMMING UP.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the contention of our opponents that the United States is not included in the meaning of the words "all nations," as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, together with the contention that the words "vessels of commerce" in that same treaty are not to be construed as including vessels in the American coastwise trade; I submit, I say, that these two contentions have fallen to the ground. They have fallen because the whole history of the preliminary steps leading to the construction of the canal proves that the theory of equal canal rights for all nations was regarded as essential. They have fallen to the ground because the text of the treaty itself shows that the United States was by name excepted from the limitations which it was not intended to apply to us. This fact clearly indicates that the negotiators of the treaty intended the United States to be subject to the other limitations from which she was not specially excepted.

Oh, I know that some one will say, "Do you mean to tell me that the United States is bound by rules 3 and 4 of article 3? Do you mean to say that we ever agreed not to gather munitions of war in our own canal on our own territory?" Ah, remember, my friend, that the Canal Zone was not our own territory when the treaty was made. It is true that no change of territorial sovereignty can, under the treaty, affect our obligations. It may be that when the Canal Zone was the property of Panama we entered into obligations which may prove embarrassing now that the territory has passed into our hands. It may be that in case of a war in which we ourselves are involved we may be obliged to rely on the doctrine "The law is silent amid the clash of arms" (inter arma silent leges). It may be that our obligations as sovereign of the Canal Zone must be differentiated from our obligations as the operator of the canal.

It is possible that my explanation of the bearing of rules 3 and 4 may not satisfy you. It does not satisfy me altogether; but it is a good deal more satisfactory than any sophistry designed to destroy the meaning of those plain terms of the treaty which forbid discrimination in the matter of tolls.

CONCLUSION.

Contemporary evidence contained in the note written by John Hay when he transmitted the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate; contemporary evidence furnished by excerpts from contemporary newspapers; and, more than all, the plain text of the treaty itself—everything points to the same conclusion, to wit, there was no thought in men's minds in 1900 and 1901 that the United States was exempt from charging the same canal tolls to American vessels as she charged to vessels of the rest of the world.

Mr. ADAMSON. Did the gentleman consume all his time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. GARDNER. I yield back that one minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to myself, for the purpose of placing in the RECORD the names of 14 Senators, "old men with failing memories," headed by the father-in-law of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] In the list are Senators Lodge, Clapp, Perkins, Bard, Foraker, Towne, Butler, Turner, Kearns, Deboe, Dubois, Pritchard, Mason, and Beveridge.

All those Senators and ex-Senators, who were Members of the Senate at that time, take the same position, namely, that the Bard amendment was voted down for the reason that it was believed the United States had the right to exempt coastwise ships from tolls without the specific declaration, as set forth in the Bard amendment, that such an amendment was unnecessary.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield one minute?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The gentleman refused to yield to me, but I shall courteously yield to him. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Was Senator Kearns in the Senate at that time?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. He was.

Mr. GARDNER. He did not vote.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. He was a Member of the Senate at the time.

Mr. GARDNER. And Senator LODGE said nothing of the sort.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself had a little controversy as to his father-in-law's failing memory, on Saturday. I quoted him on my side last; and now I have another quotation of three or four days ago on my side, which I will place in the RECORD.

Here is the quotation from the RECORD of March 25:

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Contemporaneous construction is usually regarded as very valuable if the person making it is one of repute and a student distinguished in public affairs. Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE is quoted as saying:

"When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate, it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate. * * * When I reported that treaty, my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels or that we were included in the phrase 'all nations.'"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Since I have been quoted, I wish to say that I said that in debate. The Senator from Oregon may possibly recall it. I have not changed my view as to the interpretation of the treaty. I was one of the 11 who voted against making the exemption from tolls. I did so then for what I thought good and sufficient reasons, much larger reasons than giving to certain shipping lines the benefit of a few million dollars. That view I have never seen reason to change. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator now, but later in the debate I shall take occasion to repeat the reasons which led me to vote as I did. The Senator knows I have not changed my position.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, in calling attention to the statement of the honored Senator from Massachusetts I did not say that he had changed his mind. I quoted that statement because it was sound and refreshing to read.

Mr. LODGE. I explicitly said that I did not take a different view now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly not. The Senator from Massachusetts agrees that we have the right under our treaty to do just what Congress in its wisdom did do. I am not criticizing the Senator. I am quoting him with approval on the law and the American right to free tolls for our coastwise ships through the canal.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, I know all about that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman state how Senator Fairbanks voted?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The gentleman can do that in his own time. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LAFFERTY].

[Mr. LAFFERTY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, representing a southern district, I wish to go on record in favor of free tolls for our coastwise vessels. [Applause.] The South has believed and still believes the Panama Canal means a great deal for its future commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural growth and development. For that reason the Southern Commercial Congress, composed of more than 2,500 representative southern men, unanimously passed a resolution favoring free tolls. For practically the same reason the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, with a membership of more than 3,000 progressive, representative men from every State in the Union, recorded itself in favor of free tolls. The National Board of Trade, representing the live, active commercial organizations of the Republic, declared for free tolls. Alabama and Tennessee are largely engaged in manufacturing pig iron and steel; the States of Alabama, Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Tennessee are interested in the manufacture of cotton goods. Alabama, Virginia, and Tennessee are large producers of coal.

Our leading competitors on the Pacific coast in the sale of iron, steel, cotton goods, and coal after the canal is completed will be England and Japan—the former attempting to dictate as to free tolls, and her side partner, Japan, striving to write the school and land laws for the great State of California. To impose a toll on the output of the southern iron, steel, and cotton mills and coal mines will rob the South of an advantage over her foreign competitors, and hence I believe in the interest of all the southern people it is my duty to oppose the pending bill. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party met defeat in the last two elections largely because of the so-called Cannon rules and the failure to carry out an implied or understood platform pledge to reduce the tariff downward. Let me quote from the Democratic national or Baltimore platform:

Having been faithless to its pledges of 1908, it should no longer enjoy the confidence of the Nation.

What has happened within one year after the Democratic Party assumed absolute control of the Government?

A Democratic House of Representatives, in order to be "faithless," in order to violate and repudiate a sacred promise made to the American people, adopt a gag rule more drastic, more unfair, more odious than any similar rule ever passed during the Cannon administration. [Applause.] The pledge for free tolls was not only carried in the Democratic and Progressive platforms, but in public speeches the three candidates for the Presidency—Wilson, Roosevelt, and Taft—indorsed and approved of the free tolls policy. More than thirteen millions of American freemen voted for these three men, and now, without consulting them, the successful candidate proposes to repudiate this pledge or promise upon which he was elected.

What was the closing paragraph of President Wilson's platform? Here it is: "Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign."

During the campaign the President in his own State, after discussing and indorsing free tolls and stating how the same would benefit the American farmer, uttered this statement: "Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men."

I now quote the plank in the platform upon which the President was elected: "We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal."

When I recall the fight on the Cannon rules and the charge that President Taft and the Republican Party were "faithless" to platform pledges and think of what this Democratic House and administration is now engaged in doing I believe in all fairness our friends the enemy should lose no time in extending an apology to ex-Speaker Cannon, ex-President Taft, the Republican Party, and the men who voted the Democratic ticket in the last two elections.

Well, at this late day, long after the election, the President has suddenly discovered that the English prime minister, Sir Edward Grey, is correct in his disinterested contention that we have violated the treaty, and that ex-Presidents Roosevelt and Taft and Secretaries of State Olney and Knox and about all the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, who thoroughly considered and acted upon the treaty, are wrong.

We are asked to disbelieve and repudiate our own sworn officials and accept the version of the representative of an interested foreign Government. This I refuse to do; and when the ides of November come, in my judgment, the patriotic Americans will be found at the polls electing men who will stand for the Stars and Stripes, stand for America as against the insolent and selfish demands of the British Government.

Mr. Speaker, so they want our old enemy, Great Britain, to dictate to us? She attempted to dictate to us in the Revolution. She attempted 100 years ago to impress our seamen, and her soldiers actually set fire to the Capitol building in this city. What else? When we had an unfortunate family fight—civil war—Great Britain was the only foreign country that attempted to aid in the destruction of our glorious American Union. What else? Where is our future trouble? It is in the Pacific Ocean, with the Japanese. Who is fastened with hoops of steel to the Japanese Government in an alliance offensive and defensive but Great Britain, the country the administration is now seeking to favor as against the American Republic? [Applause.]

I protest against it in the name of Washington and all of his compatriots who suffered and died at Bunker Hill, Yorktown, and on a thousand battle fields. I protest against it in the name of the great Tennesseean, Andrew Jackson, who defeated the British in the Battle of New Orleans. [Applause.]

I protest against it by the memory of those who gave us liberty and planted this free Republic. I protest in the name of those who preserved the Union and the Flag of our fathers in the Civil War. I protest against this surrender to our old enemy, and I protest in the name of every patriot and every lover of his country against this betrayal of the American people. [Applause.]

COL. HENRY CLIFFORD STUART ON FREE TOLLS.

MARCH 28, 1914.

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our privileged class is not an ancient creation but a recent growth, and as such modestly refrains from direct participation in government, contenting themselves with trying to nominate and control those whom we elect to govern us.

Obviously our rulers do not possess that independence on which alone true statesmanship can rest. Personal interest still being paramount, public interest receives only secondary consideration. Our rulers must keep their eyes on their places, and this, being intensely practical, they invariably do. It is now generally recognized that the President who does not "play politics" during his first term will not be nominated for a second, so, being poor men all, they are after a second—they "need the money."

A man must be very rich or very impractical to use power for the good of all, and our rich men are of too recent growth to be available, while our impracticable ones are unknown. So let us not expect too much of our Presidents, who are just as poor and human as ourselves and exposed to greater temptation.

The stakes in the political game are high at present; they are staking the tolls of the Panama Canal. The President is crying "national honor," which reminds one of "patriotism," the war cry of the financiers. Now it is unwise to discuss terms. It is better to confine oneself to subjects and insist upon the other fellow's giving any one meaning he pleases of a term as he proposes to apply it to the subject to be discussed.

By "national honor" the President would seem to mean that he would keep an apparent promise in a foreign treaty he did not make by breaking a solemn promise to his people in the platform on which he was elected.

Now, the real question is whether it be more honorable to keep a treaty—and no treaty has ever yet been kept when it suited the stronger power to break it—made by the few against the interests of the many, or to break it in the interest of the nation. "Honor," as now questioned, is a relative term. With us what is "honorable" politically is "dishonorable" personally: what is "honorable" in one land is frequently "dishonorable" in another.

Why raise the question of "honor"? The canal is built. Why treat it differently from any other public building? Why not free it, as all our other public buildings are free? And, rather than prate about "honor," let us free it to the world. Why charge for its use, when we charge for the use of no other public building?

But I fear this view of "honor" will be too much for the "honorable" Canadian Pacific Railway Co., which is thought to be pushing the matter in the interest of our own railway companies which do not care themselves to discuss "honor" just at present.

Our railways would make the canal the sole exception of all public buildings. They wish charges to be made for its use which will enable them to maintain their present transcontinental freight rates, to enable the dearer land to control the cheaper waterway.

Right here the Shipping Trust bogey arises. Would you betray us into the hands of the Shipping Trust owned by the railroads? I do not use quotation marks here because the Shipping Trust was a fact, but this was only because of the Panama Railway, the monopoly by which has passed with the completion of the canal. The route is now open and public opinion will not long countenance the control of water terminals by railways.

But we are not interested in ships—we have not any to speak of—the only interest of the American people is in commerce and this is now carried, nearly in its entirety, in foreign bottoms. It would be folly to exempt American ships from charges when we have not any ships, nor can not build them as cheaply as they can be built abroad, nor run them as cheaply when built, being not free to employ the cheapest labor.

What we are interested in is not the ships, but what the ships carry, what they have got in their bottoms. The "Flag" is another mere term: Foreign flags now fly over the bulk of our commerce. We are not interested in "flags," as applied to this matter, but in what the "flags" fly over—not in the ships but in what the ships are carrying. If they are carrying anything to or from our shores we are interested in them, otherwise not.

So it would seem that we can safely and "nongrudgingly" allow our President to make a dicker with our national "honor" so as to bolster his wobbly foreign policy, by laying charges on ships, of which we have none to speak of, if we be only sane enough to provide for a drawback on goods going to or from any American port, no matter what "flag" flies over them. Some day our flag may float again on the waters, but this will be a private affair of the owners of the ships, the great American public being interested only in such portions of said ships' cargoes as are going from or coming to American ports.

Faithfully, yours,

HENRY CLIFFORD STUART.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, on March 5 the President of the United States in this Chamber, in faultless English and for the English, read to the American Congress a most extraordinary document and made a most remarkable request, to wit, that the Congress of the United States, in no unstinted and ungrudging measure, vote for an unconditional repeal of a clause exempting from payment of tolls American coastwise shipping passing through the Panama Canal, incorporated in the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, a provision which had been made a plank in the Democratic national platform adopted at the party convention held in Baltimore the preceding July, and which, no doubt, contributed much to Democratic success in the election of Woodrow Wilson as President in the November following.

While the President of the United States was making this universal plea the "peerless leader" and erstwhile standard bearer of the Democratic Party, the Secretary of State, sat in the diplomatic gallery of this House and applauded his chief's request with fervor, and possibly in the same spirit and with the same object in view that the administration's ambassador to England, Mr. Walter Hines Page, had when he made his now celebrated speech of felicitation in London the other day, wherein he rejoiced in the fact that Great Britain would be the largest beneficiary of the canal.

To the retrospective mind it should not seem so very strange that Mr. Wilson's Secretary of State should applaud his Chief's demand for repudiation, in part, of his party's platform, which he himself is credited with having shaped and approved, for, having acquired the habit of repudiation, it came natural to him.

Because certain men whom he did not admire were not excluded as delegates to the Baltimore convention he, without any apparent compunction, repudiated the instructions of the Democratic convention of the State of Nebraska, to wit: "That the State's delegation should support the Hon. CHAMP CLARK for President"; and threw part of those votes and his influence to the support of Mr. Wilson, thereby defeating for nomination the honored Speaker of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have never heard that those Democrats whom Mr. Bryan desired to have expelled as delegates at Baltimore were guilty of repudiating either their party's platform or the laws of their country, but I have heard that they had repudiated the "peerless leader."

Mr. Speaker, the present great Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, Mr. Wilson's principal adviser, came into prominent notice—emerging from semiobscurity into the limelight—by a remarkable speech made in Chicago in 1896, in which he declared that certain interests should not be allowed to crucify this country on a "cross of gold."

This speech brought Mr. Bryan into great prominence, and he was made the leader and nominee of his party for the Presidency. It is not necessary to burden the House with a recapitulation of his spectacular campaigns. It suffices to say that a majority of the States refused to agree with his ideas. He was defeated, a gold standard was adopted, and this country entered on an era of prosperity such as the world never before had witnessed.

Mr. Speaker, the "peerless leader" was mistaken then. If he proved mistaken then, is it not just as probable that he and his titular leader are mistaken now? Mr. Bryan said that this country should not be "crucified on a cross of gold," and I say, Mr. Speaker, that this country should not be crucified by him and the President on a cross of St. George and British diplomacy. [Applause.] I hope and feel that I am nearer right in my contention now than he was in his position at that time.

I have listened with intense interest to the speeches made by the various gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this congressional repudiation, and my blood has bounded and my pulse thrilled as they spoke with eloquence of our national honor and the necessity of our preserving it by the "fulfillment of our treaty obligations." I, too, believe in American honor, but I also believe in our preserving that honor as punctiliously when dealing with weak powers with whom we have made treaties as with the strong.

Mr. Speaker, I have not heard of any of the gentlemen who are now so emphatic in "maintaining our honor" in connection with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty made with England, sawing the air or tearing their hair over the ravishing of the Republic of Colombia, despite our treaty with that country whose integrity of possession we had guaranteed. Oh, no. Colombia is weak and we are strong, and it is not necessary that she should be placated. Our minister to that country will not be requested to make any speeches at a banquet in Bogota felicitating the Colombians on the completion of this canal, and rejoicing that Colombia is to be the principal beneficiary.

Mr. Speaker, it ill becomes that gentleman at the other end of the Capitol who was, at the time this shameful deed was perpetrated, Secretary of War and one of the advisers in the President's official family, to prate of "national honor" and go into eloquent hyperboles about our need of maintaining it. I commend to him the study of our treaty with New Granada, now Colombia.

In the Evening Star of Friday, the 27th, President Wilson is reported as having said the South American newspapers were commenting on our course and joining Europe in its protest against our action in exempting our coastwise commerce from payment of tolls.

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the President of the United States would refer to foreign newspaper comments and give their remarks consideration, and insinuate that as one reason for our showing that "generosity" which he pleaded we should show in his message of the 5th of this month.

I suppose he is afraid we might be classed as stingy, close, a little near, if we continue to maintain our right to do as we choose with our own domestic commerce in connection with our own canal, and claim that it was not and could not legitimately be included in a foreign treaty.

Mr. Speaker, personally I would prefer at any time to be considered a "tightwad" than an "easy mark," and I commend that thought to the President when dealing with the affairs of this Nation. [Applause.] If we rescind this free-toll statute we have proved ourselves an "easy mark" indeed—yes, "dead easy."

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, if we now do this monstrous thing, this injury to the dignity and integrity of our country, at the behest of Great Britain's shrewd diplomats, we are indicting John Hay for incompetency and the Senate of the United States for imbecility. [Applause.] An examination of the roster of the Senate at the time this treaty was ratified will disclose that 75 per cent of its membership were lawyers, and the roster of the Sixty-second Congress that passed the canal tolls act will disclose that more than 70 per cent of its Members were lawyers. I also venture the guess, gentlemen, that a majority of the platform committee in the Democratic convention at Baltimore that declared for free tolls were lawyers.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, what an indictment we will have here made against their competency, if we rescind this statute. "Daniels come to judgment," indeed.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I shall insert the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas, a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States—John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America.

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India—the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States.

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. 5. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 21st day of February, 1902;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 22d day of February, in the year of our Lord 1902, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, I think any gentleman in this Chamber who will contend that we had no right under this treaty to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls and that we have a right under this treaty to fortify the canal is insulting the intelligence of the House and the Nation. I further maintain that if we are bound by section 1 of article 3 to consider ourselves and our affairs on a par with all nations as set forth in that article, we are also bound by each succeeding section of article 3; that we could not revictual or take any stores into the canal if we are at war with any nation; that we would be compelled to give the vessels of our enemy the same rights that we ourselves could enjoy; that we could not embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in accidental hindrance of the transit; that we could not remain in the waters adjacent to the canal within 3 miles of the end, and so forth. If we put our own war vessels through free we must put the warships of all nations through free.

We could not stay in our own ports at the ends of the canal for more than 24 hours in case of war. In other words, we are a Nation of great philanthropists. We have expended $400,000,000 for the benefit of other nations and can have absolutely no advantages over any of them, though they have not been out a single dollar and have had no hazard in the matter.

The thought is so monstrous, so silly, so foreign to common sense and business principles that it is an insult to the intelligence of the Nation, and should not be tolerated.

ENGLAND'S PERFIDY.

Mr. Speaker, how different in spirit was the contention of Great Britain after the signing of the treaty of Constantinople, referred to in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to the ethics she demands of us! Three days before the signing of the treaty, long after the convention had been held, Great Britain made her signature subject to a reservation. In an article by Theodore S. Woolsey, taken from House Document 461, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, under the title of "Suez and Panama—a Parallel," reference to this reservation in the treaty of Constantinople is made, as follows:

There was, nevertheless, a reservation in the British adherence to this treaty, made three days before its signature, which I think is not generally known. Prof. Holland gives it (p. 293) in his "Studies of international law," published in 1898:

"The delegates of Great Britain, in offering this treaty text as the definitive rule to secure the free use of the Suez Canal, believe that it is their duty to announce a general reservation as to the applicability of its provisions in so far as they are incompatible with the transitory and exceptional state in which Egypt is actually found and so far as they might interfere with the liberty of action of the Government during the occupation of Egypt by Her Majesty's forces."

This amounts to protection so long as England occupies Egypt; neutralization afterwards. Prof. Holland adds:

"It is owing to this reservation that, as was explained by Mr. Curzon in the House of Commons, July 12, 1898, 'the terms of this convention have not been brought into practical operation.'"

Another English writer, in the Spectator of December 10, 1898, makes a similar assertion:

"In reality the neutrality convention was never brought into force and is now a dead letter, as the Spaniards found when they tried to coal their fleet at Port Said. They claimed to regard the Suez Canal as an international piece of water; but Lord Cromer insisted and maintained his point that it was part of the waters of a neutral power. The Suez Canal is not internationalized, but is under control of the power that controls Egypt."

Whether the other powers who signed and ratified this convention will always accept this curious British view that a treaty can be declared inoperative by one signatory at will, it is unnecessary to ask. For my present purpose it is enough to call attention to the claim and to the argument. As Egypt becomes, by force of continued occupation, British territory, even so pari passu the Suez Canal becomes British waters. And likewise the converse must be true, to bring the canal under British control Great Britain must hold Egypt.

Mr. Speaker, the spirits of our Revolutionary ancestors, if they realize the attempt here being made to surrender those principles for which they fought and died, must be all atremble, and the shade of Patrick Henry filled with ire as it realizes his declaration of "Liberty or death" has been forgotten and comprehends that one of his name is advocating the surrender of our right to control our own domestic affairs, that great principle for which he so eloquently contended. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, for the man who for economic reasons and domestic expediency opposes free tolls I have the highest regard and respect.

But for him who at the behest of one man, and that man's strained construction of a treaty, or for fear of the veiled threats of foreign nations is willing to surrender our domestic liberty I have the most profound pity—yes, pity. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if I could get more time, I would like to discuss the historical and legal phases of this great question as well as its vital importance to the South, but in view of the great pressure for time I am grateful for the seven minutes that have been allotted me. I will cover these matters, however, later in the session in extending my remarks under the rule.

The President tells us that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy, and with characteristic frankness as to essential details he fails to tell us why. [Laughter.] We are left to conjecture as to the processes of reasoning through which the Executive mind evolved that momentous conclusion.

You of Democratic faith have argued that the cost of importing foreign goods, including customs duties, is added to the price which is paid by the ultimate consumer. If that contention is economically sound, pray tell me how you figure it out that a reduction of the cost of transportation in our coastwise trade will be of no advantage to our own people? If such a reduction is a mistaken economic policy, then the hundreds of millions that we have expended in improving our rivers and harbors was a mistake; the nation-wide movement for better roads is a mistake; all that we have done and are doing to cheapen transportation is a mistake. [Applause.]

But you say that there is a steamship monopoly in that trade which will prevent the benefits of exemption going to the people. We have the same jurisdiction over rates on these steamship lines that we have over rates on transcontinental railroad lines. Do you mean to concede the inefficiency of our antimonopoly laws, or do you mean that the administration proposes to abandon these prosecutions?

I deny the contention of my brilliant colleague, Mr. SHERLEY, that the purpose of the American people in building the canal was to benefit humanity in general. Their highest purpose was the national defense, the imperative necessity of which was brought home to us by that heartbreaking trip of the Oregon around the capes. [Applause.] The entire expense of the canal could be charged off the books against the national defense alone and the American people would stand for it. But in these days, when the selfish interests of nations are constantly clashing, when there is such a fierce contest for supremacy in the world's commerce, when our people are so wedded to the good old doctrine of charity beginning at home, and when the burden of taxation upon them is so heavy, it is utter folly to contend that they would give of their hard-earned treasure an amount almost equal to $5 for every man, woman, and child in the country just for the sake of humanity in general. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have made several trips to the Panama Canal. As I stood there in that tropic sun and watched them plowing the way through the Andes Mountains, I realized more than ever before the majesty of the mighty Republic of which I was an humble citizen; and, with malice toward none and charity for all, I am proud of the privilege of saying that I did not forget that it was the wise foresight, the magnificent, practical diplomacy of Theodore Roosevelt that made this matchless achievement possible. [Applause.] I believed then, as I believe now, that the thought uppermost in his great mind was: "I am doing this for America." [Applause.] And I do not believe that the people will permit the sacrifice of its benefits to the avarice of any foreign power. The spirit of 1776 still lives in the hearts of the people, and if perchance our perplexed President, whose patriotism I do not question, does not feel to the fullest its stirring thrills, I suggest that he walk out in front of the White House and gaze upon that martial figure of Gen. Jackson, so typical of the Americanism of those days, and think of the Battle of New Orleans, where those dauntless Kentuckians and Tennesseeans with their long-barreled rifles poured their leaden hail into the faces of the British, and drove them forever from American soil. [Applause.] I am sure he will receive a new baptism of faith.

Mr. Speaker, while I have the attention of this great audience, I can not forebear saying that whatever a majority of the people may have thought in 1912, I believe that a great majority of them are to-day longing for a return to the good old days of Republican American administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]. Not being one of you, my Democratic friends, it is not my province to advise, but I may prophesy. It was the intrepid leadership and masterful logic of those two great ex-Kentuckians, CLARK and UNDERWOOD, that made possible the victory of which you dreamed and for which you fought for a generation. Refuse to heed them now, and, mark my words, when your political sky is darkened, as it will be, with the somber shadow of the people's wrath, you will hear them exclaim in the cataclysm which surrounds you, and when it is too late, "O, Democracy, Democracy, oft would we have gathered thee under our wings, as a hen gathereth her brood, but ye would not." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] five minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, to say it is a betrayal of the members of the Democratic convention at Baltimore and the 13,000,000 men who voted the Democratic and Progressive tickets because we now attempt to repeal this clause in the Panama Canal act is unjust, and in behalf of the Democrats and the Progressives in the thirteenth district of Illinois I resent it, for that plank in the Democratic platform was misleading. It was brought in under the cover of the American flag and branded patriotism. The American voter so believed it to be, but when the flag is withdrawn, the plank reads thus: "National gratuity to a legalized monopoly." [Applause.] If the 13,000,000 Progressives and Democrats of this country stamp this with their approval, I thank God that I am still a Republican. In my judgment, they did not do it, but if they did, then let us abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission and tear up the bills you are trying to frame now to amend the antitrust law, and discharge the men over in the Department of Justice who are prosecuting violators of the law on account of monopolistic combinations. Mr. Speaker, the millions of common people of this country, when they understand this situation, will sustain this House and the President of the United States in attempting to repeal this law. [Applause.] Ah, but they say England is dominating us. Not I. My ancestors met the English on the bloody field of Bannockburn, and I have no particular love for them, nor do I truckle or kneel to them at all, and it has been interesting and pleasant to listen to the men in this debate twist the lion's tail and glorify the American eagle. I know of no safer or more secure place to twist the British lion's tail than on this carpeted floor beneath the dome of the Capitol Building of the mightiest Republic on earth. England dominate us! Never. Be not led astray, my countrymen. This is not a battle between the British lion and the American eagle. It is a battle between the American eagle in behalf of the people of this country and the web-footed cormorant, representing the monopoly of coastwise traders. [Applause.] Dominated by England? Never. England can not dictate to America; monopoly shall not. It is simply a question, as I view it, of standing by the people of the country as against an unjust, ravenous, and rapacious monopoly. Shall we live up to our agreement, or shall we not? That is our privilege. We can let our vessels go through the canal free if we are so disposed, or we can make them pay toll; but in my judgment, in my humble way of looking at it, I believe that, according to the treaty, we ought to charge toll to our coastwise traders.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the discussion of the pending bill rests upon the construction or interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it being asserted on both sides of the controversy that the national honor is involved, I shall insert at this point in my remarks a copy of the treaty:

Treaty between the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal. Signed at Washington, November 18, 1901; ratification advised by the Senate, December 16, 1901; ratified by the President, December 26, 1901; ratified by Great Britain, January 20, 1902; ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 21, 1902; proclaimed, February 22, 1902.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Whereas, a Convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the Convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which Convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war if a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the twenty-first day of February, one thousand nine hundred and two;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-second day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, in this age it may be considered old-fashioned to give to the English language that plain and unmistakable construction which is apparent to anyone capable of understanding language at all. It may be statesmanlike to attempt to read into a treaty or contract matters not therein expressed, thus displaying the superior wisdom of the interpreter. But, be that as it may, I believe in construing a contract between individuals or a treaty between nations in a plain, simple way, giving to the words in the contract their usually accepted meaning. When this is done it does not require a man versed in international law to ascertain what simple words mean; an honest purpose is sufficient.

Applying this rule of construction to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I have had no difficulty in determining my course, as an individual or as a representative of the people, on the question of the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. I contend when an individual enters into a contract, even though he may afterwards discover that some of the provisions of the contract are not so much to his advantage as he would like, yet, if he is a man of honor he will stand by the contract without a murmur.

It requires only a single step in the process of reasoning to apply this principle to nations, and if one nation enters into a solemn compact with another nation, and after such treaty is consummated it develops that the interests of one of the parties to the treaty have not been properly conserved in such treaty, nevertheless, that nation is in honor bound to scrupulously observe the provisions of the treaty until such time as the high contracting parties may agree upon a modification of its terms or an abrogation of the treaty in its entirety. At this point I wish to insert the following statement by former Secretary Olney. Mr. Secretary Olney in the year 1896, in an official memorandum on this subject, which is a part of the preliminary negotiations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, says:

> Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relation to each other, either of nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and effect. If changed conditions make stipulations which were once deemed advantageous either inapplicable or injurious, the true remedy is not in ingenious attempts to deny the existence of the treaty nor to explain away its provisions, but in a direct and straightforward application to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter.

Applying this reasoning to the Panama toll dispute growing out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I am fully persuaded that under the terms of said treaty there can be no possible justification for the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. The numerous articles that have been written in an attempt to prove that the little word "all" in said treaty, as used in reference to "all nations," means all nations but ours only strengthens my conviction that "all" meant exactly what the simple little word implies, and that it will not permit such expansion as will make it read "all nations but ours." Such an attempt to stretch the word is absolutely destructive of its plain, every-day acceptation.

To me it is very apparent that the advocates of free tolls for our coastwise trade either have some doubt as to their construction of the treaty in confining the exemption to our coastwise vessels or else purposely intend to discriminate between American shipowners. If sure of their ground that the treaty provisions do not apply to "our" vessels, why not permit the American shipowner engaged in traffic on the high seas and who, under the American flag, carries our products to the people of other lands to enjoy the benefits of free tolls through the canal? He is the man who has to struggle to keep our flag on the seas, and if the advocates of free tolls do not regard the treaty binding, would it not be the patriotic thing to stand by the American who suffers from the fierce competition of his foreign competitors? My sympathy goes out to him rather than to those serenely enjoying a monopoly. No advocate of free tolls is heard pleading that the treaty entitles him to this privilege. Why? I ask my friends who champion the cause of the coastwise trader. I await an answer. Permit me here to cite one illustration in order to uncover the inconsistency of their arguments.

An American coastwise ship loads with freight at Porto Rico, one of our island possessions to which the coastwise monopoly has been extended, bound for San Francisco, Cal. At the same time another American ship engaged in the foreign trade loads with freight at Jamaica, a foreign dominion, bound for the same port of San Francisco. The owner of the first vessel passes through the canal free of tolls while the other American ship pays toll. Another illustration: A coastwise vessel loads with freight at New York bound for Los Angeles, Cal. At the same time another American ship engaged in the foreign trade loads at New York bound for some port on the west coast of South America, carrying the products of our country to a foreign people and extending our trade with the world. The first vessel pays no toll; the second pays toll. By what process of reasoning our friends can justify such a discrimination and then further contend that it is no violation of the treaty, it is for them to explain.

I shall consume no further time in discussing this phase of the subject, owing to the fact that my time is limited and I wish to say a few words in regard to our coastwise shippers and the arguments advanced in favor of exemption in their behalf. In the first place, who are the American coastwise traders? What position do they enjoy in the carrying on of their business? Why are they entitled to so much solicitude on the part of our people? Let us see. For patriotic reasons I take it, on March 1, 1817, the American Congress enacted a law prohibiting any vessel engaged in the foreign trade from engaging in the coastwise trade of our country. I make no criticism of that law, for one of its purposes was to encourage the building and operating of American ships. From that day to this the men in the coastwise trade of our country have enjoyed an absolute, undisputed monopoly of the coastwise business. They have made their own rates and enjoyed all the fruits of legalized monopoly. No Interstate Commerce Commission has interfered with them in the matter of rate regulation. They have been immune from all governmental interference on that score.

They who have enjoyed this monopoly do not at this time represent a weak and dying business. Quite the contrary. Here I desire to insert an article published in the September number of the American Economic Review of 1913, beginning on page 711, bearing on this point:

> The Commissioner of Corporations has recently issued Part IV of the report of transportation by water in the United States, specifically devoted to control of water carriers by railroads and by shipping consolidation (Washington, 1913, pp. XVII, 101).
> Regular lines on the Lakes are in the hands of the railroads, being, in the main, western extensions of the eastern lines ending at Buffalo. These lines maintain water-and-rail rates at mild, fixed differential under the all-rail rates. Coastwise lines south of New York and Boston, except the Merchants & Miners Transportation Co., controlled by the New Haven Railroad, are controlled (a) by the Atlantic, Gulf & West India—the coastwise combine—or (b) they are northern extensions of southern railroads terminating at Gulf or south Atlantic ports. Long Island lines are controlled by the New Haven Railroad. Lines north of New York and Boston, including Boston-New York, are united under the name of the Eastern Steamship Corporation.
> In the course of the last seven years a consolidation of water carriers engaged in the American inland and coastwise trade has been quietly completed. This volume, read in connection with the hearings on the so-called shipping combine before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries (H. Res. 587), ought to relieve any reader of the ancient superstition that the water is free and no combination of carriers upon it can be formed. The roadbed is free, but suitable terminals are not; nor is equipment suitable for package freight or passengers to be "chartered in the open market"; nor are traffic arrangements with connecting carriers attainable for a new line on a moment's notice; nor is a traffic organization inland and prestige among inland shippers to be created overnight. Carriers of coal, phosphate rock, Great Lakes grain, and iron ore are free lances, but the carriers of package freight—the regular lines, the railroads of the water—have found they have a monopoly and have consolidated or united into rate conferences for the purpose of controlling rates. With competition eliminated, most of the reasons for Government supervision of railroad rates also apply with regard to the supervision of water rates.

From the foregoing article it can be readily seen that coastwise traders not only enjoy a monopoly, but the business is controlled and handled by gigantic corporations and combinations, among whom exist, at least, a gentlemen's agreement as to the disposition of the commerce to be handled.

The large numbers of ships controlled by these traders are not Government ships; they are the property of individuals and corporations who make use of them for private gain, and it requires a long stretch of the imagination to speak of them as "our" ships. For these men thus favored by our laws to ask the people of this Government to construct the canal at a cost of $400,000,000 for their free use in adding to their now large profits and to further ask them to maintain and operate said canal for their convenience, to put it mildly, is an exhibition of "nerve" seldom exhibited by anyone save by those who have long enjoyed the selfish advantage of monopolists.

In evidence of the fact that the great thinkers of our country never anticipated any special exclusive benefit for American ships through such a canal when constructed, I submit a statement from that great American diplomat and statesman, the late Secretary James G. Blaine. Mr. Blaine, in instructions to Mr. Lowell in 1881, looking to proposals to Great Britain for modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, says:

> The United States recognizes a proper guarantee of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama, and in the last generation every step was taken by this Government that it deemed requisite in the premises. * * * Nor, in time of peace, does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway, under the exclusive control of an American corporation. * * * It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

It is said that the $1.20 per ton tolls to be charged for passing through the canal, which as computed on the ship tonnage really means from 40 to 60 cents per ton freight tonnage, will be remitted by these traders in case of free toll to the producer and consumer. To believe this requires a greater amount of credulity than I possess. Just one illustration: A coastwise trader loads his ship with oranges on the Pacific coast for a dealer in New York. A citizen of New York, "the consumer," walks down to buy a dozen oranges. What will his share of these tolls be that is to be surrendered by the generous coastwise trader? I leave it to the advocate of free tolls to answer.

It is claimed by the advocates of free tolls that the cost of transportation from coast to coast will be affected to the extent of the amount of toll charged.

With this contention I do not agree.

I am fully persuaded that the coast trader, unless placed under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will fix a rate on such freight as will pass through the canal at a point sufficiently low to divert the business from the railroad lines; and the differential on such freight as will naturally pass through the canal is so great that the levying or nonlevying of tolls will not affect its passage through the canal in any way. The only result of levying toll will be to subtract the amount of the same from the profit of the carrier.

If it were possible to maintain and operate this canal without any expense to the people, there might be some justification in permitting these coastwise traders free passage. But when we know that it will cost many millions of dollars annually to maintain and operate the canal, and when we further realize that the millions of taxpayers living in the vast interior of our country who will receive practically no commercial benefit from this canal but will be taxed to help maintain it, and to do so for the special benefit of the rich and powerful corporations enjoying this coastwise monopoly rises, to my mind, almost to the verge of outrage.

What are the arguments advanced to convince us of the justice of the claim of the men enjoying this monopoly?

First, England is opposed to it. England says it is in violation of the treaty; therefore, England being our ancient enemy, anything England might assert would certainly be antagonistic to American interests. Notwithstanding our treaty with England, let us ignore the treaty so far as England's demands are concerned and justify, if we can, the repudiation of our contract, and give as our answer for voting a subsidy or gratuity of the people's money out of the treasury to this special interest, that England thought it was wrong. Wonderful reasoning! Shall we do wrong simply because England is interested in our doing right. The man who can satisfy himself to extend the protecting arm of the Government over a monopoly for its special protection and benefit by such jingoistic reasoning is easily satisfied. Such reasoning reminds me of a prominent Republican politician in Illinois who in 1896 was carried away with the heresy of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and who argued that all Republicans needed to do to win in that campaign was to adopt the following platform:

> Protection to American industry, the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and England be damned.

Such a contention is but begging the issue and a cheap appeal to racial prejudice.

What is another argument advanced by the advocates of free tolls for the rich coastwise monopoly?

It is that the great transcontinental railways oppose free tolls. An evident attempt to procure an advantageous exemption in law for the coastwise monopoly by swinging over the heads of Members of Congress again and again the high-sounding phrase "transcontinental railways." There is method in this madness, for up to the present time there has been no more powerful shibboleth to drive timid public men to cover than to accuse them of being subject to railroad influence.

In the years gone by, when railroads enjoyed, to a certain extent, the same happy privilege of fixing rates and issuing passes to public men as are now enjoyed by those engaged in the coastwise trade, some force might be given to this contention.

But the public man at all conversant with the situation knows that the transcontinental railroads are subject to and under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has the power to regulate their rates; and he further knows that many of the railroads of this country are to-day on the verge of bankruptcy; and that there is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission a petition praying the commission to grant to them an increase of 5 per cent in freight rates. When we know these facts the idle declaration that the transcontinental railroads are fighting against free tolls to ships passing through the canal has but little weight, for it is well known that the freight that will naturally pass through the canal between the east and west coasts of our country will go through the canal just the same, tolls or no tolls.

I had the honor of being a Member of Congress when the free-tolls amendment was placed in the Canal Zone act. I opposed it then and voted against it, and I can say truthfully neither at that time nor up to the present has any railroad company, or representative of a railroad company, either spoken to me or written to me upon the subject at all; and I am informed that no representative of a railroad company appeared before the committee having charge of the bill and opposed free tolls. So it can readily be seen that there is but little in this contention.

It is contended by those living in coastwise cities, on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, that free tolls will aid them. In this, as I have said before, I am confident they are mistaken. I do think, however, that the opening of the canal will be of some benefit to them in the carrying of certain kinds of freight, unless a combination is entered into by the coast traders of the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts to control the business passing through the canal, which, in my judgment, will very likely occur, unless the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate rates is extended over the coastwise trade.

This is a great question, and it is impossible to discuss it thoroughly in the limited time allotted to any one speaker, and I have simply attempted to call attention to a few of the matters which appear to my mind to be pertinent to the issue, and I simply wish to say in conclusion that I regret more than I can express a controversy of this character, especially at this time.

We shall soon witness the consummation of the wonderful work of constructing the canal. It is a glorious achievement of our country, and one in which I, with all patriotic American citizens, have indulged in just pride. I can see in my mind's eye the long and perilous voyage of the battleship Oregon, and I congratulate myself and my countrymen on the fact that such will never be necessary again, for as a matter of national defense we will have this canal across the Isthmus through which to pass our vessels of war. My bosom has swelled with pride as I have contemplated the vast opening trade of our country in the lands toward the setting sun passing through this great waterway, and at this time it grieves my heart to see this conflict now raging in Congress over the question as to whether or not the men in control of the powerful coastwise monopoly shall be constituted the special beneficiaries of this great national project. All others must bear the burden; the privilege of its free use shall be extended to this special interest as a gratuity.

My countrymen, it is wrong; it is a species of favoritism. It is an unjust discrimination against the American seamen on the high seas engaged in the foreign trade. It is a violation of our treaty obligations. I am an American. I love my country. I am proud of its achievements. I glory in its aspirations. I hope for its future. I would defend its honor at all times. I have a consciousness within that I am serving my countrymen and honoring my flag in opposing the claim of this gigantic monopoly. I am not truckling to England nor "toadying" to the mighty of the earth, for I bow to no one. I am a freeman representing a free constituency, and I shall not be driven from a position I believe to be right by the taunts of those who say we fear the foreigner, nor will I submit to either the pleadings or the dictation of a monopoly. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I can not refrain from paying my respectful compliments to the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber who have developed such an extraordinary and wholly gratuitous concern for the sacred and binding character of a particular clause in a single plank of the Baltimore platform. No such concern has been revealed by them in any other clause or in any other plank in that platform. And I can not resist the feeling that this particular clause has appealed to them and has aroused in them a frenzy of zealous defense because they see in it a recognition, not of Democratic principle but of Republican practice.

In the Baltimore platform the Democratic Party declared its belief in—fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is not for the faithful observance of this plank of the Democratic platform that our Republican friends and a few of their allies on this side are so fervently contending. Oh, no. This plank does not interest them. Not once have they referred to it. At no point in this controversy has it been brought forward by those who now plead for a subsidy to our coastwise shipping. But emphasis is laid on a sentence separated from the declaration against subsidies by about 10 lines. There is some mystery about this sentence. There has always been some question about how it found its way into the Baltimore platform. Suggestions have often been heard that it was surreptitious. At best it was inadvertent and gave the lie to a solemn declaration appearing less than a dozen lines above.

"We believe in fostering the growth of a merchant marine," that declaration runs, "but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury." Is it conceivable that in the very next breath the absolutely contradictory declaration could have been consciously, deliberately, and consistently made favoring "the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal"? Is it not a fair inference that this extremely discordant note was played with the soft pedal pressed down? Can anyone imagine that this utterly inconsistent declaration would have gone unchallenged into the platform had men who had fought subsidies all their lives known of its presence?

The majority of the Democrats in this House only a short time before the Baltimore convention had bitterly fought against toll exemption for coastwise shipping. It was only by a combination of a minority on this side with the Republicans on the other side that the toll-exemption clause was written into the canal measure. It was not a Democratic achievement. Democrats had not wanted it. They recognized its true character. They knew it to be a disguised subsidy, and therefore in contravention of Democratic principles and of Democratic practice. The ablest Democrats on the floor of this House at the time denounced the subsidy proposition in unmeasured terms and the Democratic press of the Nation was merciless in its criticism of the coalition of a minority of the party with the party of privilege sitting on the other side of this Chamber.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks us if we have spent $400,000,000 on this great international waterway only to surrender it to the traffic of the world. He takes the position that since we paid for it, since we did all the work upon it, since we have assumed all responsibilities in connection with its upkeep and operation, we have paramount rights in it, rights superior to treaty obligations, rights of absolute sovereignty, rights which we may assert without regard to the opinions of mankind.

Yet was it not our proud boast, Mr. Speaker, that this great enterprise was the generous and voluntary contribution of the American people to the world? When we undertook the digging of the canal was it the intent and purpose to turn it to our exclusive or particular advantage? Do not the very terms of the treaty under which the enterprise was inaugurated make it clear that it was in the broadest spirit of altruism that we approached the task and assumed its enormous and staggering responsibilities? By the terms of this treaty we disavow the seeking of any special advantage. We bind ourselves in that pact to accord equal treatment to all the world in the use of this highway between the oceans. No amount of pettifogging can obscure the plain words of that pact. English could not make the intent clearer. "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality." Thus runs the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Why shall it be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war on terms of entire equality? The answer is explicit. It is "so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise." That was the plain, the unmistakable, and the understood meaning and purpose. There was no controversy over the matter at the time the treaty was adopted. Everyone accepted it as meaning what it said. No one thought then of contending that it meant something else. No one dreamed then that it left the United States free to discriminate against the vessels of commerce and of war in the use of the waterway. No one then so much as thought that under the terms of this solemn pact the United States, without dishonor, could pass its own vessels through the canal free while levying tolls against those of other nations.

Mr. Speaker, it was left for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to discover—with gratuitous Republican help—that the treaty meant something else, and that the terms of a surreptitious or inadvertent plank in the Baltimore platform were more binding than an international treaty whose ratification by the President had made it a part of the law of the land. It was with some amazement that I found the gentleman from Alabama reading into the treaty meanings that had not been suspected at the time of its negotiation or while it was pending in the Senate. But it was with greater amazement that I found him reading into the principles of the Democratic Party the very essence of privilege, telling us that our party is traditionally committed to the policy which I had always believed, and which I still believe, to be the peculiar and historic property of the Republican Party and its Tory antecedents. If any principle of the Democratic Party is clear, it is that special privilege is intolerable. We have always declared for equal rights. We have always denounced special privilege. Now and again, perhaps, we may have lapsed from grace. For short periods we may have wandered off into the wilderness after false lights. But always we have come back to the broad highway of Jeffersonian truth. And it seems to me that no one who has ever trod that highway or let the great light which illumines it shine in upon his soul can have done so without realizing that the granting of a privilege is essentially the denial of a right, and that we forsake the Democratic ideal the moment we take up with the notion that it is a proper function of government to deal out favors and bestow largesses on a class.

And what is this toll exemption but a largess? What is it but a thinly disguised subsidy? What is it but a gratuity out of the Public Treasury to one of the most rapacious and insatiable of all our trusts? For our coastwise shipping is in an iron-bound trust. There is no more competition in that quarter than there is between the subsidiaries of the Steel Trust or those of Standard Oil.

It is a notorious and scandalous, a graceless and unregenerate, spawn of privilege, fostered by navigation laws which only cunning could have conceived and ignorance supported. And the gentleman from Alabama is leading the Republican minority, having forsaken the Democratic majority which had proudly honored him with its commission, in an effort to perpetuate a system of subsidy intended still further to enrich this powerful and most insolent offspring of favoritism. Out of the Public Treasury it is to receive millions in the way of an exemption which will give added strength to its deadly grip on the coastwise commerce. Out of the Public Treasury by indirection it is to enjoy a subsidy which even the Republicans would not dare vote it directly. Would either the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] or even the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] have the hardihood to stand upon this floor and advocate a direct, open, frank, undisguised subsidy to the Coastwise Shipping Trust? I think not. Yet, stripped of all pretense, toll exemption is nothing but a subsidy, a gift from the Treasury, a bounty, a favor, a "burden on the people" precisely of the sort denounced in the Baltimore platform.

The gifted gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has found much amusement in dragging Secretary Bryan into this controversy. He excited loud laughter on the other side by recalling some remarks made by the great commoner regarding the sacredness of platform pledges and their inviolability. "Probably the only plank in the Baltimore platform he insists upon is that plank which provides 'that we favor a single presidential term,'" said the distinguished gentleman from the Pacific coast. But what was it that Secretary Bryan said regarding the sacredness of platform pledges? Speaking before the house of representatives at Harrisburg May 13, 1913, the new premier of the Wilson Cabinet said:

> The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specific year after year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it. * * * I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the Representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

It was my great good fortune to hear this speech and to witness the remarkable effect it produced. There were men in that hall—representatives of the people—who were deliberately plotting to violate the specific pledges of their party platforms. Not all were Republicans. Some of them had been elected as Democrats. It was to these faithless servants he was addressing himself, and it was before his merciless logic that these men quailed as before a scorching blast.

Yet laughter on the Republican side followed the reading of Mr. Bryan's words by the gentleman from California. Why? Because Mr. Bryan himself has been faithless? Because he himself, by violating a platform pledge, has become a criminal worse than the embezzler of trust funds? That is the implication. But is it the fact? Has Mr. Bryan violated a party pledge? Emphatically no. The platform pledge is definite, specific, unmistakable, and consistent with the whole record of the Democratic Party. That pledge is to foster, "by constitutional regulation, the growth of a merchant marine, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury." Is there any gentleman on either side of this Chamber who is willing to indict Mr. Bryan on the charge of violating this pledge? Or can any gentleman on either side make a case against him by proving that he has repudiated a surreptitious or at best an inadvertent clause in the platform a few lines below which is flatly contradicted and nullified by the substantive declaration and pledge almost immediately preceding it? It seems to me that pettifoggery could scarcely go further than it has gone in this case in the effort to discredit Mr. Bryan and to confuse the real issue.

That issue is primarily one of good faith. Many ingenious and highly technical legal arguments have been advanced during this debate in support of the contention that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty meant something diametrically different from what it says. But if the treaty meant or was designed to mean that under it discriminations in favor of our own shipping was not only allowable but praiseworthy, why was the specific proposition voted down by the Senate when the treaty was under consideration in that body? A strenuous fight was waged by a minority of Senators for the adoption of the Bard amendment to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Here is the Bard proposal:

> The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

This amendment was voted down by a decided majority—43 nays to 27 yeas. Plainly the understanding was clear then that discriminatory treatment in favor of our own shipping was not provided for in the treaty, nor was it desired. Had it been desired, the Bard amendment would have been written into the instrument. Had it been provided for in the original draft, the Bard amendment would have been unnecessary; it would not have been offered and vehemently urged. The 27 men who voted to incorporate it in the treaty did so because they wanted discrimination in favor of our own vessels and knew that without the amendment no such discrimination would be permitted. The 43 who voted against the Bard amendment did so because they opposed the idea of discriminatory treatment in favor of our own shipping and knew that to incorporate it in the treaty would be to nullify its spirit and distort it from its true purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I am no lawyer; not one, even, of the cornfield variety. I confess myself unable to follow the devious windings of some of the arguments advanced by those opposed to the repeal of the toll exemption clause in the canal act. But I believe that I am as competent as any lawyer to read the English language and to gather its meaning. And I am encouraged in this belief by observing that my present interpretation of the language of the treaty, long after those who drew it have passed along, is precisely the interpretation given it by contemporaneous authority. John Hay and Lord Pauncefote seem to have interpreted it as I interpret it to-day. The Senate of the United States, which voted down the Bard amendment, obviously interpreted it as I interpret it at this moment. The nations of the earth interpreted it then as they interpret it now and as the Democrats in this House interpret it, in spite of all the confusion and pettifogging on the other side. For this reason I am willing to rest my case with the people and to stand with Woodrow Wilson for the vindication of the national honor. Mr. Speaker, do not understand me that I hold my present position solely because the President has appealed to his party and to the country for the repeal of the toll-exemption clause in the canal act. I stand to-day, as a Member of this House, just where I stood as a private citizen when the canal act was before this body. I fought favoritism then, as I am fighting it now. I stood then against this monstrous perversion of governmental power, as I stand at this moment. Long before I ever dreamed of entering this historic Hall my mind had been made up on the question of subsidies and other favors to individuals or classes. For years my life has been a devotion to the high ideals of fundamental Democracy. Every instinct of my nature rebels against the suggestions of privilege. I hate the very name of protection in its distorted meaning. And it is because I hate protection in whatever phase it shows its hideous head that I stand here to-day in my capacity as a humble representative of the plain, unprivileged people back home to protest with all my might against bestowing a privilege on an already privileged monopoly in violation of a sacred pact with the peoples of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker: I am much gratified in being able to state upon so momentous an occasion as the present one is that two years ago, when this same question was before Congress for consideration, I voted then as I shall vote now.

The great question then was and is now: Shall ships which are owned in this country and which are doing a coastwise trade only be passed through the Panama Canal free of tolls?

I have heard every argument which has been advanced in favor of "free tolls" for these ships, but I have not heard one yet which, in its final analysis, was not a plea for "special privilege" in favor of this gigantic ship trust. Two years ago the speeches made by the advocates of "free tolls" were mainly along the line that if "free tolls" amounted to a "subsidy" it was an excusable one; but now the trend of their argument is that we are conceding the contention of Great Britain that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided that ships owned by citizens or corporations in Great Britain should, in effect, pay no more toll for passage through the Panama Canal than ships owned by citizens or corporations of the United States should pay.

Stirring appeals are now being made to the pride of the American people with the hope of inflaming them against Great Britain so that "ship subsidy" may be granted under the deceptive guise of maintaining the national honor.

I insist that the net result of "free toll," no matter under what form of deception it may be concealed; no matter upon what false premise it may be flaunted, "ship subsidy" it still will be.

Grant, for argument's sake, that the flag of our country is being lowered in disgraceful cowardice before the frowning menaces of Great Britain; you have but offered insult to all America for no purpose other than to favor "special privilege." The Republicans say that when we vote against "free tolls" through the canal we thereby are voting in favor of a transcontinental railway trust.

Is there such a trust? If so, it was conceived in republican sin and nurtured and fostered in extortion from the American people.

Because there may have grown up, under republican misrule, a great transcontinental railway trust is no argument to me that a shipping trust should further be built up by giving it "free tolls" through the people's canal.

Instead, why should we not deny this "special privilege" to the "shipping trust" to-day and dissolve the transcontinental railway trust to-morrow?

This we intend to do; and when we have done it we will be rid of this "ship subsidy" as well as the transcontinental railway trust.

You want both; we intend to have neither. Long before the completion of the canal the "ship trust" took it away from the people whose money constructed it.

Although we are now leaderless in this body, we have formed ourselves into an "orphan brigade," and are fixed in our purpose to drive out the "ship trust" and give the canal back to the people whose property it is.

We who seek this repeal are for the United States as against Great Britain; we are for the people as against the "ship subsidy." The canal will soon have been built for the benefit of the people, and not for the further enrichment of the few who own the "ship trust."

During this argument some of you who oppose this bill have said that unless "free toll" is given to coastwise vessels that articles of foreign manufacture will undersell articles manufactured in this country. They use that as an argument against the bill. I use it as an argument for the bill.

A tax of over $400,000,000 has been imposed upon the people, principally through the selling price of manufactured articles, for the purpose of building the canal. May I ask to what better use the canal can now be put than to make it the channel through which that tax may be returned to them by giving cheaper manufactured articles?

The republicans contend that to charge the "ship trust" with tolls, and thus give the people cheaper manufactured articles, will be hurtful to the wage earner in the American manufactory. To them I answer: Pass such an immigration law as will prevent the foreign laborer from coming into American manufactories as a competitor of the American laborer in his own land; then you can not even pretend to need a "ship subsidy."

We passed a good immigration bill, but your President (Taft) vetoed it.

That which is called "immigration" has ceased to be immigration. Long ago it became "invasion."

The laborer of other lands has invaded our own. Peaceful though that invasion may be, it is just as destructive to the prosperity of the American wage earner as though it were made with the sword. This peaceful invasion drives the American wage earner from his fruitful occupation into hunger and nakedness; it drives his children into ignorance and serfdom. Invasion by the sword could do no worse. And yet you come to tell the country that a gift from the people's money in the way of "free tolls" must be made to the "ship trust" in order to protect the American wage earner.

It will, perhaps, cost millions of dollars every year to maintain and operate the canal. I charge that all of this vast amount of money which is not paid by the ships which pass through the canal must be paid by a tax upon the people, who already have been taxed to construct it.

You charge that a democratic Congress passed the "free toll" bill two years ago. I deny this, and say that the republicans of that Congress, with only a small proportion of the democrats in that body, passed the bill.

You say that a democratic national convention adopted a platform which declared for the "free-toll" proposition. This I admit, but say that it was done under the misapprehension that a majority of the democrats in Congress had already passed it.

You say that the democratic nominee ran upon that platform declaring in favor of it. He did; but it is not necessary to quote all of the old saying that "a wise man changes."

Somewhere in the Good Book a contrast is made by the Master himself between the man who fell into sin and the man who continued to live in sin. If men, good and wise, were not properly susceptible to change, then the Savior need never have come to earth; the Apostles need never have preached Christianity to the unbeliever; the missionary might just as well be recalled; and those who now constitute the minority in this House upon this question should accept their own argument and burn, undelivered, the speeches in the preparation of which they have spent so much time for the purpose of converting others to their views. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

CONGRESS AS A JURY.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, for weeks I have been voluntarily serving on a jury; I have considered diligently the evidence; I am now prepared to render an impartial verdict based upon opinions expressed by citizens for whose judgment I and all other Members of this House have the highest respect. These opinions have been supplemented by those of highly esteemed constituents, and I have now reached a decision whereby I can conscientiously cast my vote as one Member of this great jury of the American Congress.

A juryman is asked to render his verdict upon the evidence submitted in court. In following out a similar course in this case I am free to say that up to Saturday night I did not know what my vote would be. The question which this jury is called upon to decide is the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it is upon this question solely that our verdict must be rendered.

If there is one asset greater than all others to an American citizen it is his pride in national honor. I am not a lawyer, and can not deal in legal terms, but as an American citizen—call me, if you will, a Yankee trader—a bargain is a bargain, and when one is made I will abide by it, come what may. It is not for us to say whether a good or bad bargain was made by the negotiators of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but for us to interpret its terms, so far as legislative action is concerned, and absolutely live up to its provisions.

The honor, integrity, and reputation for square dealing of an American citizen is of far greater value than the paltry thousands of dollars that would ever come into the Treasury of the United States or the benefit that would accrue to any of its citizens through the exemption of tolls. When so many opinions of great merit have been expressed as upon this subject and so opposite in character, a decision must be rendered on the preponderance of evidence.

Hon. Joseph H. Choate, a personal friend from my boyhood, offers to my mind the strongest evidence in favor of repeal in his speech delivered before the Chamber of Commerce of New York on February 13, 1913. Mr. Choate was the honored and distinguished ambassador to England when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated, and certainly his evidence in first-handed. He says, referring to the understanding of Lord Pauncefote and Mr. Hay:

I think it is quite proper that I should say what I believe both of them, if they were here, would say to-day—that the clause in the Panama Canal bill exempting coastwise American shipping from the payment of tolls is in direct violation of the treaty.

I venture to say now that in the whole course of the negotiation of this particular treaty no claim, no suggestion, was made that there should be any exemption of anybody. How could there be in face of the words they agreed upon? Lord Pauncefote and John Hay were singularly honest and truthful men. They knew the meaning of the English language, and when they agreed upon the language of the treaty they carried out the fundamental principles of their whole diplomacy, so far as I know anything about it, and in the six years I was engaged with them their cardinal rule was to mean what they said and to say what they meant.

Let us admit we have made a mistake and go forward and reverse it.

The expressions of opinion of the distinguished senior Senator from New York are too well known to this House to need quotation.

From the rostrum of this House Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, submitted on March 5 this evidence:

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with too strained or refined a reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing that we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

And now let us as briefly review important evidence on the other side.

The most convincing argument I have read is contained in the paper, which was read at the annual meeting of the American Society of International Law on April 25, 1913, by Hon. Richard Olney, of Massachusetts, Secretary of State under Grover Cleveland. I commend the entire article to the consideration of the jurymen, but can only take the time of the House to quote one extract and his findings:

The facts being, then, that the United States has rightfully built the canal through territory of its own; that besides having become the owner of the canal route the treaty expressly accords to the United States all the rights incident to construction; and that in undertaking the canal as a United States enterprise the United States did so with the manifest purpose of excluding all foreign control beyond that resulting from the stipulation for equality of terms to all users of the canal, what is there in the language of the treaty to justify the claim that the United States has made a further submission to foreign control by a stipulation which prevents it from allowing the use of the canal by its own vessels or those of its national on any terms it chooses to fix? The treaty is a contract by which the proprietor of a canal fixes the terms upon which it grants the use of the canal to its customers.

On the grounds and in view of the considerations above stated, the United States may contend—and it is believed can rightfully contend—that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November, 1901, does not, as justly interpreted, prevent the United States from exempting its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal.

Former President Roosevelt testifies before the jury as follows:

I believe the position of the United States is proper as regards coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic. There is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise trade from tolls. I believe the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In his message to Congress on August 19, 1912, President Taft said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and of treaties which precede it, I feel confident that the exemption of coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on all vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Candidate Woodrow Wilson, on August 15, 1912, more than a month after his nomination at Baltimore, in discussing the Democratic platform, and especially its reference to tolls exemption of the Panama Canal, spoke as follows:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The distinguished senior Senator from my own State, while in favor of repealing the tolls exemption, does not hesitate to say that his views are not based upon the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that while the language of the treaty is vague, it nevertheless does not contain a moral obligation not to exempt our coastwise vessels.

While all quotations I have made have, I believe, already been made upon this floor during the course of this debate, I am repeating them in this concise form for the reason that it is the evidence which I have considered in reaching the conclusion that it is my duty to vote against repeal. I submit that the weight of this evidence from the highest authorities on both sides strongly bear out my conclusions.

I entered upon my service as juryman in this case with an absolutely free mind. I am now fully convinced that as a Nation we are in no way breaking faith with foreign powers. Further, I am convinced that we are doing only what they would do in our place, namely, defending the integrity and uprightness of our national character, while at the same time we are supporting and protecting American interests. [Applause.]

THE TREATY WITH PANAMA.

This juryman being now prepared to vote and to render his verdict strictly upon the evidence, will lay aside his rôle of juryman and argue the merits of the case very briefly.

Comparatively little has been said in the course of this debate upon the manner in which this country received the actual right to construct the Panama Canal. This right is in no way a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but was secured through the adoption of the treaty with Panama under date of November 18, 1903, signed by John Hay and P. Bunau-Varilla, wherein a strip of land 10 miles wide is conceded to the United States upon payment of $10,000,000 and $250,000 per annum, to begin nine years after the treaty was ratified. Article 2 of said treaty reads as follows:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. * * *

ART. 3. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement, and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and water mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any sovereign rights, power, or authority.

This is conclusive evidence of the primary rights of the United States on the Isthmus of Panama. So long as the canal is maintained we have perpetual control over that area, and for the purpose of maintaining our canal and all features incident therewith that area is as much United States territory as the District of Columbia. No nation ever offered to share the expense of the construction of the canal, and no nation ever questioned our right to expend our money thereon or to control the Isthmus for canal purposes. [Applause.]

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The first article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is one of agreement that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is superseded.

The second article is one of agreement that the United States should construct the canal and be responsible for financing it, thereby being allowed to "enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Article 3 is formed in a different way. It is not designated as an article of agreement, as the two previous articles are, but rather states in explicit terms six rules adopted by the United States. Rule 1 is the cause of the present discussion, and is as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

There are two considerations here: The first is the cause of opinion in the minds of persons that we are not dealing justly with foreign nations, and arises from the fact that so many people have not actually considered the phraseology of this clause. I wish I was gifted with lung power sufficient to request every citizen of this country to read this clause.

The impression among the people of the country is that this clause says that the canal shall be "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality," but that is not what it does say. It says the canal shall be "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality." Even Mr. Choate, in his speech, to which I have already referred, failed to quote these words, "observing these rules."

Who can fail to interpret these words to mean that the United States is recognized as having the power to make rules which must be observed? Now, in what way is that power secured? There is only one possible explanation, and that is the ownership of the canal is recognized by Great Britain in its assent to this term.

The section of the country in which I reside is noted for its many beautiful and attractive country homes. At the entrance to nearly all of them will be found signs which read something like the following: "This entrance for guests only." "Visitors not admitted by this roadway." "Guests only," and so forth. These signs are indicative of the ownership of the party authorizing their erection. They have absolutely no bearing nor application to the owner himself, his family, or his employees.

Where the public is admitted we frequently see the sign, "Please do not pick the flowers." Would anyone consider that that sign was to apply to the son or daughter of the owner of the property?

These are homely illustrations, but they are pertinent to the interpretation of rule 1, whereby the United States, owner of the Panama Canal, is authorized to say to her sons and daughters engaged in coastwise traffic: "You may have permission to make such use as you need of the locks and dams your Government has constructed and paid for across this Isthmus, but when the sons and daughters of a foreign power who are entire strangers to me seek to enter here on terms of entire equality one toward the other, so that there shall be no discrimination in respect to conditions or charges of traffic as between each other, they must observe the rules."

It was surely this viewpoint that Hon. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires, had in mind when he wrote to Secretary of State Knox on July 8, 1912. In concluding his letter, he said:

> If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by the exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

The absurdity of the situation in case of war, provided the owner has no right to his own, was plainly shown by the great Democratic leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, in his speech on Friday last, when he used these words:

> If no discrimination can be made in favor of our war vessels, we will be compelled to recognize the contention that if during war with a foreign power we find the enemy's man-of-war in the canal we can not drive it out; and if it leaves, we must wait 24 hours before giving chase. If engaged in war, our own ships must chase themselves out of the canal in 24 hours.
> The contention of those advocating the British claim seems almost absurd when we recognize that if we admit them for vessels of commerce the same reasoning will require us to admit them for vessels of war.
> To do so would convert the canal in time of war into a liability instead of an asset.

This same principle is borne out in the memorandum of Secretary Hay, wherein he said:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that it (the canal) is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by us.

I therefore am willing to rest the case on a fair interpretation of the plain English of these two treaties, and not only urge Members of this House to give them careful study, but likewise disseminate the phraseology of them to every nook and corner of this country, so that every citizen will thoroughly understand and appreciate that the canal is owned and controlled by us, as they now understand that it was built by our money. For one I conscientiously believe this to be the truth, and shall vote against the Sims bill for this reason. [Applause.]

THE PENDING BILL.

Now, I desire to take up the origin of the Sims bill and discuss the present status of the case.

President Wilson delivered his request to Congress on March 5, and used these words:

> Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. * * * We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

These sentences offer ample reasons for voting against the Sims bill. Our university-trained and scholarly President asks the Members of Congress, who are the agents of the owners of the canal, to consent to allow foreign nations to tell the people of this country in what manner they shall manage and control their own property, bought, paid for, and constructed by America with American money and American brains. Briefly stated, it means that we recognize we are not capable of managing our affairs, are not free and independent, and need a conservator over our assets of the Panama Canal.

I have too much red American blood in my veins to be so generous toward the request of a foreign nation as to yield "without quibble or hesitation, whether we were right or wrong." [Applause.]

Finally he says to us:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequences if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

The brevity of the President's address precluded the possibility of his confiding to Congress what the other diplomatic questions are which he has in mind. There is no opportunity, so far as I can see, of Congress to know what is in the mind of our President by his reference, but it is held over the head of Congress as a threat.

THE GAG RULE.

The next feature of interest is the rule under which we are considering the Sims bill.

Stripped of its parliamentary verbiage, the rule means that House bill 14385, the Sims bill, is to be debated for a time not exceeding 20 hours, and that no motion of amendment is in order.

It further means that the discussion of this proposition of such far-reaching effect in the affairs of this Nation must be considered under the phraseology of the bill as introduced by Mr. SIMS; that an amendment to change the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" is not in order; that an amendment that would even suggest arbitration of this question is not in order; and that the final voice of the American people on this great question, if any change is made from the present law, must be the voice of Mr. SIMS.

During my brief service in this House the greatest measures under consideration, namely, the tariff and currency bills, were freely debated. Innumerable amendments were offered, and all were thoroughly discussed. The Speaker himself in his speech of congratulation to the House, upon the passage of the tariff bill, referred to this very fact, that no special rule had been adopted and that all Members had free opportunity of discussion.

These important laws can be amended at any time by Congress, and are laws for the Government of the people of this country; but to-morrow we will be called upon to vote upon a question so far-reaching in its effect that it virtually becomes a part of the treaty obligations that will govern the action of this Nation for all time.

Congress is recognized as the forum of free speech of American people, through its Representatives, but this momentous question can not be thus considered. The rule means that we, the Representatives of the American people, must so limit our discussion of this question as to confine all remarks thereon, both for and against the bill, to the very short period of 20 hours; or, to be mathematically accurate, if every Representative on this floor, representing from 200,000 to 250,000 people, voiced their sentiments, he would be obliged to limit his statement to 2¾ minutes, and would have no right to change a single word of the bill.

We have often heard of the gag rule, but this phrase does not accurately describe the present rule. It so far transcends in its gagging all previous gag rules that a new description should be invented, and I beg to suggest the name of "gaggers' gag rule to gag Congress."

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] doubtless introduced the bill in exactly the form President Wilson thought it should be adopted, "whether right or wrong," and therefore it is so sacredly perfect that no Member can suggest or have considered an amendment of any kind.

The revolt against such a high-handed procedure as this was well evidenced on Friday last, when 55 Democrats, realizing that they were doing so in spite of the patronage they would not be allowed to dispense in their districts, openly rebelled and refused to vote for the adoption of the rule. We need no better evidence that even the proposers of the bill themselves realize that it is wrong, but that under the party whip of their schoolmaster taskmaster desire to avoid the sting of its lash, and accept this method of procedure and the accompanying legislation, "right or wrong."

I frequently read before becoming a Member of this House of the czarism of its Speaker, but I am glad to be one of those to applaud the stand of the present Speaker, wherein he not only refused to be a czar himself, but also refused to allow the President of the United States to be a czar over him, and declined to vote in favor of this rule.

We also heard much in former years of the "big stick," but the wielder of the "big stick" never asked Congress to vote for a measure yielding American rights to a foreign power, nor for a measure which its Members were not to consider whether it was right or wrong. [Applause.]

ARBITRATION.

Mr. Speaker, there is a very easy and proper way to find out whether we are right or wrong in this matter. If right, as true American citizens let us maintain that right, come what may. If wrong, let us as gladly acknowledge it; but do not let us, at the behest and order of the President, considering that we are right, ignominiously and dishonorably acknowledge that we are wrong.

The Panama Canal has cost our Government nearly $400,000,000. There is no citizen of the country, however humble his station, that does not point with pride to it as of American construction and ownership. Do not let us detract from any citizen's pride by being obliged to tell him that while he is part owner and builder of it he has no control over it.

The canal will be opened to the commerce of the world within a few months. Undoubtedly an American ship, engaged in coastwise traffic, which, as the law to-day stands, will be exempted from tolls, will be among the first to pass through. No doubt about the same time some British vessel of commerce will pass through upon which tolls will be collected. There is then established a question of arbitration between this country and Great Britain. This question can either be referred to The Hague or to a special tribunal selected for the purpose, as recommended by Mr. Olney. The citizens of the United States will cheerfully and gladly abide by the decision of an impartial court of arbitration.

I will vote for a suitable amendment to the Sims bill which will refer this question to such a court, but I will not vote for the bill unamended. Why are the President and his friends on this floor so fearful of the adoption of such an amendment that they have forced through the rule to prevent it?

Therefore, instead of yielding rightly or wrongly in 20 hours in order that the President may, as he says, "know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence," the plain duty of every Member of this body, as I see it, is to defeat the iniquitous Sims bill so as to have the question at issue brought up in regular course of procedure by means of arbitration, after the opening of this great monument to American money, enterprise, and brains. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, the question involved in this controversy is not alone the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; a new and more vital issue is presented. Shall the great Democratic Party in redemption of its promises be repudiated and again become a community of warring factions? Shall we invite the disaster that overtook our enemy whom a justly indignant people hurled from power for its faithlessness and cowardice with all the vengeance it could summon? That problem is up to this Democratic House. It is an American problem and I warn you that the Congress will not be stampeded to vindicate the malice, however just that malice may be, that exists on the part of one country because of the treatment of Great Britain. I warn you further that the people are with the President of the United States. They believe in him and trust him and expect us to vindicate him in his contest for a new freedom for the people. Towering above every other consideration is the necessity to retain the Democratic Party in power. What matters what your opinion is when weighed in the balance with the far-reaching consequences that are impending upon our action? A year ago in the consideration of the tariff bill we listened to the wise counsel of the great leader of the majority, for whom no other man in this Chamber has greater admiration than I. Standing on this floor where I stand now, facing the same men I face now, he uttered these words: "I have, as you know, different views on some of the schedules, especially Schedule K, than those of the President of the United States, but I am willing to forego my opinion and uphold the policies and promises of our Democratic President." That was the most magnanimous act of all his political life, and those of us who believed with him followed his example. I look into the faces of the representatives of a hundred millions of American citizens; brave, able, courageous, and patriotic men. It has been my good fortune to have my lot cast within your shadow. I have heard the able Speaker tell the story of 20 years of conflict with the enemy for the return of good government. I have heard our magnificent leader tell the story of his conflict with the Republicans from one Democratic administration to another covering a period of nearly 20 years. I have seen how at least the "ark of the covenant" of the fathers with their faith has been delivered to your possession. Do you propose now to let it turn to ashes in your hands? My party! I glory in her achievements, her purposes, and her faith more than that of all the parties that ever enlisted human endeavor. I shall not forsake it while it holds in its possession the inlaid destinies of the greatest Anglo-Saxon Republic of the world.

I shall vote for the bill we are now considering to repeal, the law providing for free tolls, because in my opinion it is in direct contravention of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I do that for the following reasons, some of which I urged against free tolls for coastwise shipping two years ago:

First. Because under the terms of the treaty between ourselves and Great Britain we were required to treat every nation, citizen and subject thereof, using the canal, including ourselves, "on terms of entire equality without discrimination." To refuse to do so and exempt American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls would be a violation of the treaty, a betrayal of national honor, and a reversal of our whole purpose and policy in constructing the canal.

Second. To the extent that we remit the tolls of the American coastwise shipping through the canal, to that extent we subsidize that shipping; an act repugnant to the whole democratic policy of government and against the platform declarations of our party.

Third. The attempt to relieve our coastwise shipping interests of their fair share of the burden of meeting the expenses of the canal by remitting tolls for passing through the canal is to aid and assist one of the most indefensible combinations that is now engaged in domestic commerce.

Fourth. To discriminate in favor of coastwise shipping is a discrimination against the interior business remote from the coast. It is an additional tax upon the remote business man to aid the coastwise shippers in his already strong competitive advantage he has on his rival.

Fifth. Remission of tolls does not alone affect our shipping; it would give just grounds for new and bitter antagonism against American capital in foreign countries. Retaliation would be reflected in our international obligations that would affect and cripple our foreign commerce.

Sixth. The enormous burden of protecting and caring for the canal, which includes interest on the original cost, maintenance, transfer of troops, replacements, and so forth, amounting to the enormous sum of thirty to forty millions of dollars a year, ought to be borne by all the people, and any remission of tolls would increase the burden on the rest of the people to the extent that the coastwise shippers are favored.

Seventh. Free tolls extended to American shipping would invite reprisal and resentment. Such usurpation of authority to discriminate in favor of our shipping would destroy the standing we have as a great, just, powerful Nation with foreign Governments. It would seriously impair our sovereign leadership among the nations of the world for a higher and more perfect democratic government.

Eighth. Remission of tolls to American shippers would seriously interfere with our purpose to neutralize the nations of the world in the movement for universal peace, in which movement we are the leaders.

Article 3 of section 1 of the treaty is the article over which this controversy has arisen. It reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of conditions of charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

How shall that article be construed? Is it the contention of those who believe in "entire equality without discrimination" that it needs no construction because there is no ambiguity in the language? No statement can be made plainer to express the meaning the two Governments attempted to convey, and no different meaning can be wrenched from it than it does convey unless other words are interpolated into it. No man in this Chamber ought to be charged with wanting this Government to violate its sacred honor with other powers. No citizen ought to attempt to interpret the contract treaty, recognized as the supreme law of the land, except under the same rules and formulas recognized by all the civilized powers of the world as the correct rules of interpretation—those rules expressing the highest equities between nations and individuals not in contravention with the text of the treaty. There are two grounds upon which advocates of free tolls place their argument, and only two. First, because the coastwise vessels are engaged in a trade by virtue of a statute that creates them into a special class operated by American citizens alone and in which no foreign Government can participate, and, consequently, they are not within the contemplated purview of the treaty; second, because the United States owns the canal, is charged with the protection and management of it, and has the sovereign right to discriminate in favor of coastwise shipping under the treaty, because the canal is built on territory owned practically by the United States. The last-named reason is usually expressed by the advocates of exemption in "We own the canal," "We built the canal," "Our money constructed it." But the gentlemen urging these reasons, because our coastwise business is purely American and not competitive, because policing, regulating, and owning the canal, forget that written in conjunction with the right to build, own, regulate, and manage the canal was written this clause of the instrument:

Subject to the provisions of the present treaty.

This instrument, like all other contracts, must be considered as a whole, and those sections intimately related must be construed together. Section 1, article 3, is directly related to article 2. After declaring that "there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions of charges or traffic," the treaty proceeds to set out how the United States may proceed to build the canal, and article 2 provides as follows:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription and purchase of stock or shares, and that subject to the provisions of the present treaty the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

In whatever manner the United States might elect to construct the canal, or assist in its construction, it could only do so by preserving absolute "equality so that there could be no discrimination against any such nation, etc." Where in the section quoted does the United States reserve the right to exempt the coastwise vessels from payment of tolls? Is it to be disputed that if such exception is to be maintained that it was necessary to note it as an exception in the treaty itself? Suppose that the Government had turned the construction of the canal over to a private corporation that was to have a part of the proceeds derived from toll as compensation for the construction. Is there a person here who could say that the United States could compel the corporation to relieve any class of vessels of any nation that was a source of revenue to the corporation from the payment of tolls under the terms of the treaty? Where under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did the United States reserve any exception in favor of its own coastwise ships or the power to compel any corporation it either employed or subscribed for stock in any company that constructed the canal to remit the tolls of our coastwise trade? The United States did not only not make such reservations but was precluded from doing so under section 1, article 3. But let us make this illustration clearer. Suppose a stock company under the direction of the United States had entered upon the construction of the canal and England, Germany, France, and the United States had taken stock in the enterprise as an investment, where dividends depended upon the tolls from ships passing through the canal, and that it was constructed as it would have been required to be under section 1, article 3. Suppose, after the completion, England and the United States undertook to send their coastwise vessels through the canal free from the payment of tolls under the article above referred to, would Germany and France, as stockholders entitled to dividends, submit for an instant to such injustice and discrimination? Bear in mind that it is immaterial which one of the agencies were employed by the United States in constructing the canal—whether we built it ourselves, or loaned money to a private association, or bought stock in a corporation, no greater or more exclusive right accrued to the United States, existed under one method of construction, than under either of the other two as set out in section 1, article 3.

But it is worth while, Mr. Speaker, to call a living witness, who was present and assisted in the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, who speaks the opinions of both diplomatists with reference to the exemption. I quote from the language of Hon. Joseph H. Choate, our ambassador to Great Britain, whose statement can not be received but with great credit as to the intentions and understanding of both representatives. I quote from the Washington Post of December 5, 1912. He says:

As the lips of both these diplomatists and great patriots, who were true to their own countries and each regardful of the rights of the other, are sealed in death, I think it is proper that I should say what I think both of them, if they were here to-day, would say—that the clause in the Panama Canal toll act exempting coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls is in direct violation of the treaty. I venture to say that in the whole course of the negotiations of this particular treaty no claim or suggestion was made that there should be any exemption of anybody.

It is important to know that every man who demands free tolls for coastwise shipping first eliminates from consideration the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. He totally disregards it in the discussion. That course is necessary to give the proponents of free tolls any standing. Complete repudiation and nullification of the terms of the treaty is the first position he assumes. The preservation of national honor is immaterial and national integrity has no consideration with the toll grabber. There is another and important element that must not be lost sight of by those of us who believe that the enforcement of the highest laws of the land should still be recognized and sanctioned, and that is the element of national neutralization. That is an attribute of "equality of treatment without discrimination." The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, published February 22, 1902, embodied as the basis of neutralization substantially the same rules embodied in the convention at Constantinople October 22, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. Every man who has given the subject attention knows that the beneficial use of canals depends upon their neutrality and universal use. Neutralization is necessary that the constant activities of commerce may not be interfered with by belligerent nations; that the canal shall not be used as a strategic point of warfare between contending powers. If our coastwise commerce is to be relieved from tolls, it will likewise be relieved from neutrality by the vessels of other nations using the canal. No country is bound to observe neutrality toward another country that discriminates in favor of its own vessels. We have made the Panama Canal neutral in time of war and peace for the commerce of all nations, but no nation discriminating against another is bound to observe neutrality as to that nation. Let me quote from John Bassett Moore on the relation of neutrality to equality of use. He seems just now to be an eminent authority. He says:

Equality of tolls has been treated as a feature, or, perhaps, rather as a condition of neutralization. Little need be said upon the subject, since a discriminatory policy, even if it did not lead to the building of another canal, would surely provoke retaliation in some form and prove in the end to be impracticable.

I quote also two additional extracts from the report of Senator Davis, of Minnesota, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

As to the neutrality and the exclusive control of the canal and its dedication to universal use, the suggestions that were incorporated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty came from the United States and were concurred in by Great Britain. In no instance has the Government of the United States intimated an objection to the treaty on account of the feature of neutrality—its equal and impartial use by all the nations.

I quote again from the same report:

No American statesman speaking with official authority or responsibility has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control the canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all with one accord declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and also open on terms of impartial equality to the ships and commerce of the world.

I quote one more paragraph from the same authority:

Whenever a canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien it will be ultimately made subject to the same laws of freedom and neutrality as govern the Suez Canal as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

I quote again from the same document:

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the great act of October 22, 1888—neutralization of the Suez Canal—without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of the Isthmian Canal and its use by all nations, without discrimination.

That is what Senator Davis said; that you can not assume an attitude of opposition to neutralization that involves "equal treatment to all nations, without discrimination, unless you repudiate and discredit the official declaration of this Government for 50 years." It is particularly set out in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the "general principle" of neutralization shall not be impaired, and direct reference was made to section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty containing the "general principle." Now, what was section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that we propose to preserve? I quote:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object but to establish "general principle," they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practical communication, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus that connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communication—should the same prove practical, whether by canal or railways—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canal or railway as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charge or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve as just and equitable, and that the same canal or railway, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States or Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engages to afford.

Now, what is it that is provided in this section of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that was carried forward in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and is now binding upon us? It was the general principle of neutralization, providing for (a) protection to the canal; (b) equitable charges without discrimination; (c) the same right open to the citizens and subjects of every power, giving protection and neutrality. These provisions, as I said, are carried forward into article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Where is the exception for the coastwise vessels of either the United States or Great Britain? It must not be forgotten that Great Britain has a large competing coastwise trade with us. If our coastwise trade is to be exempt, why has not Great Britain a right to claim her coastwise trade exempt also, she being the other interested party to this contract? Certainly provisions in a treaty that would bind Great Britain would bind the United States in a contract where no exemptions are set out. Is it to be presumed for an instant that Great Britain would not have guarded the coastwise trade of her Canadian citizens if there was the slightest possibility that we were secretly reserving the right to spring this vague philosophy upon them to exclude our trade when the canal should be open? What is the rule of construction of such instruments as this treaty that we are now considering? It is an elemental principle of construction of all documents that a preamble shows, first, the reason for the agreement or document or act; second, that the language of the body of the instrument or document should be so construed, if reasonably possible, to give effect to the purpose.

[Moore's Fifth Digest International Law, p. 249.]

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed so as to carry out the apparent intention to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in this construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning as understood in the public law of nations and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended, and it has been held by this court that when a treaty admits of two constructions, one restricted of rights that may be claimed under it and the other favorable to them, the latter is to be preferred. (Howensteine v. Lynhan, 100 U. S., 483; Goefy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 271.)

The rule laid down in the cases cited has been the one universally followed in the construction of treaties from the beginning of the Government. I shall emphasize that statement by a quotation from President Roosevelt, when he proclaimed a treaty ratified and effected on February 22, 1902. In the final statement of this proclamation is found this clause:

To the end that the same and every article and clause thereto may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

The President of the United States notified the world of our purpose—of our high purpose to carry out in the utmost good faith every provision that every article in that treaty contained. What is the fact with reference to the attempted substitution of a clear declaration for article 3 involving the coastwise shipping? I quote from Senate Document No. 85 of the Congress when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before the Senate for ratification:

On the question to agree to the amendment proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit, strike out article 3 and substitute the following:

"Article 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulations and management of the canal to discriminate in respect to the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of our own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

That proposition was beaten by a vote of 43 to 27. It would naturally seem that the proposition to discriminate in favor of our coastwise shipping was settled in that vote; that the Senate recognized by that vote that to relieve the coastwise trade of toll charges assessed against it the same as should be assessed against the traffic of every other power that it was necessary to make a distinct reservation in the treaty for that purpose, and by no possible line of argument could such intendment be shown without such reservation. To show that the subject was thoroughly discussed and understood, that Senator knew that a distinct reservation was necessary to relieve our shipping from the payment of tolls, both Senator Frye and Senator LODGE, both members of the Foreign Relations Committee, both of whom had charge of the treaty in the Senate and voted against the Bard discriminating amendment, each introduced bills in the Senate to provide out of the Public Treasury the payment of tolls for coastwise vessels. Senate bill 1348, introduced by Senator Frye, provided for the payment of tolls and transit charges of public vessels of the United States and merchant vessels of the United States passing through the Panama Canal. The bill was in the following language:

Be it enacted, etc., That all tolls and transit charges that may hereafter be imposed upon public vessels of the United States and on merchant vessels of the United States for passing through the Panama Canal shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and there are hereby appropriated annually out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated such sums as may be necessary for this purpose, and such appropriation shall be deemed annual appropriation.

Senator Frye and Senator LODGE initiated this sort of subsidy legislation for coastwise shipping, knowing that under the treaty there was no construction of it that would relieve the coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls. "Equality of treatment to all nations, citizens, and subjects" can only be obtained by compelling all vessels without discrimination to pay tonnage charges at the canal. There can not be absolute neutrality except by equal treatment, and I shall close this feature of my discussion of section 1, article 3, by quoting from the Commissioner of Navigation, annual report of 1911, page 12:

The river and harbor act of 1884 was passed in the full knowledge that Congress, of course, would have imposed tolls on all vessels using any of the improved waterways on which so much has since been expended. Just as Germany imposes tolls for the navigation of the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal. It was passed with the knowledge that if it chose to impose such tolls Congress must impose them on American vessels as well as foreign vessels, for the United States and all maritime nations make no discrimination on account of the flag.

I also cite from page 17 of the same report, where in part the commissioner says:

Our treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation usually contain a special article on the coastwise trade. Thus article 13 of our treaty of February 21, 1911, with Japan—our latest important treaty—provides: "The coasting trade of the high contracting parties is excepted from the provisions of the present treaty and shall be regulated according to the laws of the United States and Japan, respectively." There is no such article in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and there is no need to read such an article into the treaty. Within its concise provisions the Frye bill (the one above referred to) has provided fully for the coastwise trade as well as for foreign trade, and for merchant vessels as well as for public vessels of the United States. That bill, in brief, is based upon the belief that in accord with our treaties every nation, including the United States, will contribute to the support of the canal in proportion to the use it makes of it. Each nation is free to choose the manner in which it will make the contributions. All of the nations, of course, will adopt the same method of making the contribution in behalf of their vessels of war, namely, by direct appropriation from their treasury. Nations will differ as to the manner in which they will provide for the contributions in behalf of their vessels of commerce. Some will require each shipowner to pay himself the tolls on his vessels and look to his freight and passengers to recoup himself. Other nations will pay subsidies to some of their ships or navigation bounties to all of them sufficient to pay in whole or in part the canal tolls. Still others will appropriate specific amounts to pay the tolls of specific steamship companies. The Frye bill proposes that the American people shall pay the American ships, and their cargoes shall not pay tolls, but shall enjoy the navigation of the canal precisely as they now enjoy untaxed the navigation of a thousand improved American harbors, rivers, lakes, and canals.

Numerous citations in addition to these could be made. It is not necessary. The rules of construction are as firmly settled as any principle of legal procedure.

It has been asserted by a few Democrats and many Republicans that to vote to repeal the act subsidizing coastwise shipping is a repudiation of the Baltimore platform and a violation of Democratic doctrine. Too many men in discussing this question have contented themselves with mere statements without the necessary proof to sustain them. Let us see what the Baltimore platform is before we talk about repudiation. I read from the plank on merchant marine, and the only reference, by the way, to the tolls question:

We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics on the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Then, with a brief reference to the enactment of laws for the greater security for life and property at sea, it says:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

These gentlemen who are affirming allegiance to Democratic platforms as their highest and most solemn duty in the discharge of their official conduct can take whichever end of that plank they choose and repudiate the other. That there is an absolute inconsistency in the two declarations upon the same subject no man who understands the English language will pretend to deny. For myself I propose to stand by the historic and traditional position of the Democratic Party with reference to subsidies and bounties. We wrote into the Democratic platform adopted in Cincinnati in June, 1880, that we favored—free ships and a living chance for American commerce on seas and land. No discrimination in favor of transportation lines, corporations, or monopolies.

That was a third of a century ago that we reannounced and reaffirmed the cardinal doctrine of the Democratic Party. In 1904 the Democratic national convention in St. Louis wrote into its platform:

We denounce a ship-subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstruction raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the seas. We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

You wrote into the Democratic platform adopted at Denver in 1908:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

That is the historic attitude of the Democratic Party on the subsidy question. But we have done more than to affirm our position on this question in party platforms. The Democratic Party has fought every attempt to filch from the Public Treasury people's money in the form of subsidies, gratuities, or bounties, to be handed over to special or corporate interests. Through the united stand of the Democratic Party we have been able, with the support of patriotic Republicans, to defeat every subsidy measure for 16 years in this House. The first bill introduced after the confirmation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was by Senator Frye in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and passed the Senate, largely Republican, by 42 to 31. That bill was introduced by Senator Fry, who, as before stated, was a member of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Senate and had charge of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty when it was before the Senate for ratification, and after the Senate had determined by an affirmative vote not to reserve the right to exempt American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, and after he knew that no reasonable and fair construction of the treaty would relieve the coastwise shipping from payment, introduced this bill for the purpose of reimbursing the coastwise shipping for its payment of tolls under the treaty. This is the same bill resulting in its passage in the Senate that was condemned in the St. Louis platform in 1904 as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes.

A Democrat who believes that his party was right then who now proposes to vote to take from the pockets of the people or from their Public Treasury from one to three millions of dollars to pay the toll passage through the canal of the most indefensible combination existing in our domestic commerce ought to apologize to the Republican Party, even at this late date, for the condemnation you meted out to it in our platform for doing then what you propose to do now. The next bill to mulct the people in subsidies and bounties was Senate bill 529, of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which passed the House by a close vote, and through the energetic efforts of the House conferees failed to be reported back for confirmation. The next attempt to subsidize private interests with the people's money was Senate bill 28, of the Sixtieth Congress. After the hardest fought battle ever made to open the doors of the Public Treasury for the benefit of cooperative capital it was defeated by a yea-and-nay vote of 175 to 173. A narrow margin of 3 votes saved the people from the grip of the private shipowners of the country. If the Democratic Party has stood for one thing more than another, it is that it refused to take the money of the people to directly promote private capital. The Democratic Party has stood like a stone wall against gratuities, bounties, and subsidies for any business that skulks from fair and free competition and seeks to be reenforced from the people's taxes. Gentlemen who stand for this donation to the coastwise shipping of the country, not only in violation of an elementary Democratic principle but one carrying with it equal and exact justice, now ask us to repudiate the whole policy of the Democratic Party on this proposition in order to affirm our allegiance to a subsidy approval of the Baltimore platform that received no consideration in the committee and that no man during the entire argument of this proposition has explained the method or process by which it got into the platform. I align myself with the history of my party, against the proposition that seeks to collect taxes to promote a private interest that has developed into one of the most reprehensible monopolies. For more than 15 years the Democratic Party has made it impossible to be written into law the right of any man or set of men or any interest or combination of interests to take the money of the people in the promotion of subsidies. This Government has been good to the coastwise trade. It has shut out the foreign shipper from our local business, and properly so, and given him a monopoly. We have taxed this great people $400,000,000 to open up 8,000 miles of additional coast line for them and give them a position in the commercial affairs of this country so that they could control vast fields of new business, amounting to many millions of dollars annually. Not satisfied with that exhibition of generosity from a great Government, they "abuse our patience" by dividing up all the business on the Atlantic seaboard among themselves, so as to eliminate all fair and honest competition, to which the people who made these contributions in their interests are entitled. With these concessions handed over to them, without money and without price, with the command to go forward and do the trade well-nigh of this Western Hemisphere, they have the unspeakable nerve to ask us not only to violate in their interests the highest law of the land for their selfish purposes, but to go down into our pockets, pay the interest on the immense cost, pay the running expenses and the constantly increasing charges for protecting and providing this great pathway for their business, but they also demand that we pay for them the price of passing through the canal.

Regardless of treaty considerations, and I have the highest conviction that a remission of tolls would be in direct violation of them, merely as a business proposition I would be against discrimination for coastwise shipping. On what sound business policy ought we to discriminate in favor of any class of business that reaps the benefit of an expenditure of nearly $400,000,000 contributed from the earnings of all the people? Such great expenditure by a generous people demands reciprocal obligations by those who ask and receive the benefits of this generosity. It is a shocking proposition to hear advocated by some of the leaders of our party that we ought to reverse the Democratic policy and doctrine of a century and subscribe to the Republican theory of subsidies. I care not whether you call it subvention or bounties or what term you apply to it or designate it by, it is classed in the last analysis under the generic term "subsidies."

It is admitted as fundamental that no nation can become a great power without a great foreign commerce; but the corollary does not follow that we must subsidize a shipping monopoly to get it. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated in substance that the remission of tolls would handicap our foreign trade and result in material benefit to the advantage of Great Britain in her foreign commerce. The absurdity of the proposition is patent to everybody. We have passed every nation on either hemisphere in the volume and value of our foreign trade. We undersell England in her own colonies and let her carry our goods to her markets in her own bottoms. We have taken this position in the commerce of the world through the thrift and genius and enterprise of the American people. We propose now to open up a new pathway to the Pacific Ocean and bring ourselves nearer to its ports and the Orient by from 3,000 to 5,000 miles. How can that shortened distance in travel to us alone help our competitors? Such statements are on a par with the confusing remarks relative to our sovereignty. Gentlemen fail to distinguish our limitations in a commercial sovereignty in the consideration of the canal tolls proposition from our political sovereignty. No man questions for an instant the absolute political sovereignty of the United States in the management, control, and protection of the canal; and no man who has given the subject thought, but who will admit that our commercial sovereignty is limited not only by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but by the treaty with Panama wherein we acknowledged and ratified the limitations set out in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

What are some of the equities in this proposition? Let the Member from the Middle West who proposes to vote for exemption of tolls recollect that we have already added in the construction of the canal nearly $400,000,000 to the assets of the coastwise shipper. That your interior business man, who is at long-armed disadvantage with the coastwise user of the canal, contributed to that amount, and you propose to put him to a still further disadvantage by loading him with a share of the burden of its upkeep and running expenses that the coastwise shipper ought to pay. How can you justify that kind of conduct to the business man of the interior? Not only is our domestic commerce in the interior discriminated against in the remission of tolls, but by such remission you invite resentment and reprisal against our capital invested abroad. Gentlemen who boast that our sovereignty is supreme and what we can do regardless of the wishes of foreign powers or the consequences of our acts ought to remember that that sovereignty ceases at the water's edge; that American capital and American trade not only deserve but must have your protection and the friendship of the States and the people in which it is invested. There is nothing in all the sphere of our activity that the United States wants more than the friendship of foreign powers. Do you want to impair the sovereign leadership of this Republic among the nations of the world for a higher civilization, a more democratic form of government? If you do, vote for the remission of tolls to the coastwise monopoly and invite reprisal against our foreign business. Do you want to strike a fatal blow at our purpose to neutralize the nations of the world in the movement for universal peace? If you do, vote this gratuity to the coastwise combinations.

I close, Mr. Speaker, with a quotation from a colloquy by Senator LODGE with Senator Bacon, page 6062 of the RECORD, submitted by Mr. GARDNER, of Massachusetts, on Saturday. The wisdom of the Senator's views can not be overestimated. I quote:

> I mention merely my own impression, which was that it left the fixing of tolls to us, but it is very clear to anyone on the simple reading of the clause that the interpretation is open to doubt. I think on the face of the words either view can fairly be taken. Such being the case, Mr. President, I do not wish anything done by which this Government could ever be exposed to the suggestion even of not acting in good faith under a treaty. I think we should be most punctilious, even if there is nothing more than a doubt about a word in carrying out the treaty strictly to the letter.

Gentlemen, the problem presented in this contest rises above party and involves the good faith and high purposes of the whole people. In all the seas of the world the American flag has asked no favors and never been refused equal treatment with every other power. The markets of the world are ours. Will you close their doors against us in this discrimination? Shall we be branded in the eyes of civilized nations as unreliable, selfish, and of questionable integrity in the performance of our highest contractual relations? Shall we invite a united foreign activity and discrimination against us in our efforts to accomplish the great purposes for which we are destined, to solve the world's problems of government economics and morals? [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ].

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I simply rise to submit for printing in the RECORD the protest and resolutions of certain organizations in New York, among them the United German Societies, opposing the repeal, to show that we are not all subsidizers or all Irish who are opposing this bill.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat, has he any objection to including a speech from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] on the subject of violating platforms?

Mr. METZ. Not at all. I will very gladly include that, if the gentleman wishes.

The protests, resolutions, etc., are as follows:

VEREINIGTE DEUTSCHE GESELLSCHAFTEN,
New York, March 28, 1914.

Hon. HERMAN METZ, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I trust that you will support the American position in the free tolls repeal movement. The United German Societies, with whom you are acquainted, last night by a vote of 66 to 3 adopted the resolutions of which I inclose a copy. We are 110 societies strong, representing 11,000 members. Although it was made clear that Germany did not favor the free-tolls provision and might benefit by its repeal, the United German Societies took the American position, and I feel confident that you will range yourself on that side, for undoubtedly the question is not free from doubt, and Americans should give their own country the benefit of any doubt.

I wish to call to your attention a phase of this question which may interest you, and that is this: That if the repealers will be successful it may afford President Roosevelt an issue of betrayal by the Democratic Party of American rights which will sweep this country. You know as well as I that there is so much antagonism, latent and outspoken, against Britain that it only needs an opportune issue to acquire such force as to sweep any party from power; and I for myself, though I have never voted any but the Democratic ticket, will stand with Roosevelt on this issue. With best wishes,

Sincerely, yours, A. G. KOEBLE.

Whereas the Panama Canal has been built by Americans, with $400,000,000 of American money, upon American soil, and is therefore an American waterway, through which American vessels engaged in domestic trade should be as free from tolls as are any other American ships using any other American inland waterway;

Whereas the right of American coastwise ships to free tolls has been upheld by Roosevelt and Taft, Republican Presidents, by two Senates and three Congresses, by Olney, Democratic, and Knox, Republican, Secretaries of State, by the United States Supreme Court, by high American authorities, and even by a note of the British legation in 1912;

Whereas Congress, in 1912, exempted American coastwise ships from tolls, and the three great political parties and 13,000,000 voters approved such exemption;

Whereas Hon. Woodrow Wilson, as a candidate for President, standing upon the Democratic platform, and individually, pledged himself to free tolls;

Whereas the British Government alone protested against such exemption—the country which has violated every treaty it ever had with America or any other nation, and whose interpretation of any treaty should, in the light of history, be viewed with distrust and suspicion:

Resolved, That, while we do not question the good faith of our President, we, as American citizens, declare for an American, and against a British, interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Resolved, That we call upon the President of the United States to withdraw his appeal to Congress to repeal the free-tolls provision, and afford the people of this country who unanimously declared in favor of the American interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an opportunity at the November elections either to reverse themselves or redeclare their approval of the American interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Resolved, That, in any event, we call upon all the Members of Congress, and, specifically, upon those of the State of New York to uphold the American interpretation of that treaty and so prevent a misguided though well-meaning President from inflicting a loss of national dignity upon this country and from surrendering American rights to our traditional British enemy.

The Springhurst Taxpayers' Association, of Bronx County, in meeting assembled at their clubhouse, No. 1085 Leggett Avenue, on the 28th day of March, 1914, unanimously adopted the resolutions that follow:

Whereas there is now pending before Congress the matter of the repeal of the free tolls on the Panama Canal; and

Whereas the last Congress has seen fit to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal; and

Whereas the money, skill, and ingenuity of the American people has accomplished the gigantic task of digging said canal: Now be it

Resolved, That we, the Springhurst Taxpayers' Association, of Bronx County, hereby appeal to our Representatives in Congress to take a firm stand against the repeal of said free tolls and again demonstrating to the English Government that we conduct our Government in the interest of the citizens of this country and without dictation from any outside government, and least of all England.

NEW YORK, March 28, 1914.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Citizens' Democracy held this evening the following resolution was adopted and the undersigned were directed to forward it to the New York Members of Congress:

Resolved, That, having in mind the rights, dignity, and honor of the United States and the interests of its coastwise shipping, we protest against the attempt to repeal the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act at the dictation of England and the transcontinental railroads, and we urge the Members of both Houses of Congress to vote against repeal and preserve to the United States the right to control its own waterway for all time.

Respectfully,

G. MURRAY HULBERT, Chairman.
JOHN T. MARTIN, Secretary,
2493 Valentine Avenue.

On January 8, 1910, Hon. R. L. HENRY, the gentleman from Texas, from his place on the floor addressed the House. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 61st Cong., 2d sess., p. 438.)

There are only two ways in which the people can instruct their servants in this representative form of government. They must give their instructions through party conventions in platforms, or primaries voicing their views. If such methods fail, platforms and primary instructions are fraudulent and representative government a failure. The party that violates its platform pledges is unworthy, and deserves the scorn of honest men. In platforms we announce our party creeds, and any political party not performing its pledges is not entitled to the confidence of honorable citizenship. Its decrees, inviting the people to join their advocacy, should be as sacred as the promise to our fellow man in all other affairs. A Representative receiving a commission of the people should perform every platform mandate of his party and every pledge made by himself or decline, and thus permit the selection of an agent who will honorably keep the faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Such course is right and in keeping with the genius of our Government. The opposite view renders absurd party organization and popular government. With us the people are the creator and the official the creature. To reverse the proposition makes our system a sham and travesty on popular government. When the people are betrayed through platform bolting and defiance of party organization, Democratic institutions are imperiled. * * *

With loyal partisans platforms are the supreme party law, and must stand as their creed till proper organized action repeals the same and substitutes a new faith. Furthermore, redemption of party pledges after the election as well as before are alike sacred, whether defeat followed our flag or not. Defeat does not change a platform or promise from an honest obligation to a fraud and game of confidence to secure votes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] An honest pledge continues until honorably discharged. Any other view means bad faith and party chaos. No party deserves to win that does not avow with courage its position on all issues, with deliberate intention to redeem every pledge. And when the platform is announced and candidates chosen every loyal party voter is equally bound to support creed and candidate with the same fidelity, and default in either event is party disloyalty and reprehensible. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Hence, when my party acts, whether its actions be right or wrong, so long as I remain a member thereof I shall steadfastly support its platform demands and nominees. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No other course remains open for one who professes adherence to any reputable party.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I can understand how a man who is for peace at any price might advocate the passage of this bill, believing in giving up anything at the threatening demand of any nation rather than run the risk of war by insisting upon our rights. I can understand how a truckling imitator of the British aristocracy might bring himself to consent to its passage. But I can not understand how any man with real red American blood in his veins can contemplate this proposed abject surrender to Great Britain without being filled with indignation and shame. Two years ago we settled this matter in a purely nonpartisan way and in the most solemn manner possible after exhaustive debate and most careful consideration by both branches of Congress and the approval of the President of the United States. Now, without advancing any new argument or the presentation of a single new fact, upon the demand of Great Britain we are asked to humiliate our country before the whole world by abjectly reversing our action of two years ago. Whatever my opinion may have been before the question of tolls for the canal had been formally settled, I could not consent to this abject surrender of about the last right incident to ownership unless it can be clearly shown that we are in honor bound to do it. No such showing has been made.

A reading of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty leaves no doubt in my mind that we are well within our rights in insisting upon free tolls for our ships when engaged in the coastwise trade.

Article 2 of the last Hay-Pauncefote treaty states that it is agreed that our—Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Article 3 says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

It is a universal rule of statutory construction that one part of a statute is to be construed with reference to all the other parts of it. This rule should be applied to the construction of this treaty. Observing that rule, the provisions of article 3 should be read in the light of the provisions preceding it in article 2, which says that we are to build the canal not in partnership with Great Britain, but alone, and to "have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction." What rights are incident to our ownership of the canal, if the right of free use is not? Use without expense to the owner is one of the universal rights of ownership. Without this right the purpose of ownership is gone. The right of regulation and control is specifically granted by the treaty, and what right was intended to be granted to us as "incident to such construction," if not the right to freely use it for our domestic commerce and our ships of war? I can think of no other possible right intended to be granted by this language of article 2. Will some strict constructionist against his country please tell us what right was intended to be granted to us by this language?

But eliminating article 2 for the moment, and considering article 3 by itself, it seems plain to me that the agreement was not intended to cover our domestic mercantile commerce. It will be seen that in the same sentence are coupled the words "vessels of commerce" and the words "of war." These words are contiguous and connected by the word "and," without any qualifying or limiting word of any kind. If it was intended that our own warships should pay the same toll as those of other nations, then it is plain that our merchant vessels should. If this provision contemplates that our warships should not pay toll, then the conclusion seems to be irresistible that our merchant vessels were not intended to be included in the provision. Does anyone seriously think that when John Hay signed the provision of the treaty which I have quoted he ever for a moment thought that anybody would claim that Uncle Sam had agreed that he would take the money out of his Treasury and pay it back into the same Treasury to pay the same canal tolls as the warships of other nations? It is plain that no such thing was intended. If not, the conclusion is irresistible that Uncle Sam's merchant vessels joined with his warships in this provision affecting both kinds of ships were not considered at all in the agreement. Having built the canal, at a cost of nearly $400,000,000, it is inconceivable that John Hay, patriotic American and astute statesman that he was, ever contemplated that he was bargaining away the ordinary and universally incidental rights of ownership in the future Panama Canal. The canal being ours, he never thought that anybody would have the monumental "gall" to deny our right to use it as we please in a matter affecting only our own internal domestic policy. Our coastwise trade is not the concern of any other nation, and whether we charge ships engaged in it toll for passing through the canal or whether we do not is none of their business. None but Great Britain would ever claim otherwise. I believe that a fair construction of the treaty would fully justify us in excepting all our merchant ships from the payment of tolls; but, however that may be, we resolved this doubt against ourselves by putting our ships engaged in the foreign trade upon the same basis as those of other nations.

If this bill passes it will be a complete reversal of our policy as to transportation routes since the foundation of the Government. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars upon the improvement of our harbors and waterways and have never charged any tolls for their use to our own shipping. This policy has been dictated by the knowledge that free transportation means cheap transportation, a thing of vital interest to all the people. Nobody ever thinks of demanding that ships that ply the Mississippi River or the Sault Ste. Marie Canal should pay tolls, and yet the Panama Canal is upon the soil of the United States just as truly as the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and, so far as our domestic commerce is concerned, is just as much an internal waterway as the latter.

It is claimed by some of the proponents of this bill that even if we give free tolls to our own coastwise ships, the people will not get the benefit of it. They shout loudly against the Shipping Trust, and so forth. To talk about a shipping trust upon a transportation route that is free to all our ships is ridiculous. You might as well talk of an automobile trust upon the free highways of the country. There has been no shipping trust on the Great Lakes, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, nor upon our rivers. Why, then, should there be on the Panama Canal? The freer it is the surer it is that no such trust can ever be maintained.

Several gentlemen on the other side of the aisle have loudly condemned the toll-exemption provision of the present law as a ship subsidy. This has amused me greatly, as I have not forgotten that this Congress put into the present tariff law a provision giving a 5 per cent rebate on the duty imposed upon foreign goods when such goods are carried in American ships. If this provision should work as successfully as its authors hoped and expected, it would be ten times the concession to American shipping that the toll exemption would ever be. Yet, as I remember, every Democrat on this floor voted for this provision in the tariff law. After swallowing that camel they pretend to strain at this toll-exemption gnat. To what ridiculous extremes politicians will sometimes go in a desperate attempt to justify themselves for violating their pledges!

Some people do not understand the interest of Great Britain in the repeal of this toll exemption, since the ships of her subjects, they say, can not engage in our coastwise trade. But England doubtless confidently expects to secure a large part of our ocean to ocean coastwise traffic if the bill now under consideration becomes a law. That her expectation will be realized, I have not a doubt, unless our laws governing coastwise shipping are greatly modified. Our present laws would not prevent an English ship taking a cargo of Pittsburgh or Chicago steel rails, for example, from Montreal and delivering them at San Francisco. Pittsburgh rails could be delivered at Montreal nearly as cheaply as they could be at New York or Baltimore, while Chicago rails could be delivered via the Great Lakes and the Welland Canal cheaper at Montreal than at New York. Everyone that understands the subject, I think, will admit that on anything like an even basis the ships flying the English flag will take the business from the American ship every time.

If our ships must pay the same tolls as the English ships they are on an even basis, and the English ship could and would make a through rate from Pittsburgh or Chicago that would take the business from the American ship without any trouble. Or, take a cargo of fir lumber in Washington; this lumber could be shipped from the Washington mills to Vancouver nearly or quite as cheaply as to Seattle. An English ship making a through rate could undoubtedly land this lumber in Boston, New York, or Baltimore cheaper than the American ship, and so, of course, would get the business. Our California canned and dried fruit could be taken in an English ship from San Francisco to Montreal and delivered via the Canadian Pacific Railway in Michigan, Wisconsin, or Minnesota, or anywhere near our northern boundary as cheaply or more cheaply than an American ship could deliver the goods at the same destination through an American port. Some of us have hoped that a canal free to American ships in the coastwise trade might stimulate the building of American ships to engage in this ocean-to-ocean traffic, and so the flag to that extent be restored to the sea. But if this bill becomes a law we see the bulk of this business being done by ships under a foreign flag, and our hopes for a revived American merchant marine once again have "gone a glimmering."

For many years the people of California have prayed and worked for the building of the Panama Canal. They have wished this chiefly not because such a waterway would give California-owned ships an easier and shorter route to Europe, most important though such a result be; not because it will give the ships of our Atlantic coast freer and quicker access to us and our ships to them, as desirable as that result is; but chiefly because its building will serve as a regulator, a controller of transcontinental railroad freight rates, thus enabling our products to reach the great interior and eastern markets of this country and their products to reach us at the lowest possible transportation cost. We understand, as the whole country will soon understand if this bill becomes a law, that the $1.20 per ton toll charged our domestic ships engaged in the coastwise trade for passage through the canal will add $1.20 per ton to the tribute that every transcontinental road can and will collect from all the people in the form of freight charges. That is the meat in this cocoanut and accounts for the activity of some people in the effort to secure the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

[Mr. BARKLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill now pending before the House involves the honor of the American Republic, and our action on this bill will vitally affect the standing of our country among the nations. The proponents of repeal have raised the cry of "subsidy" to the coastwise shipping interest. In reply, some of the opponents of repeal have answered "subsidy" to the Canadian Pacific and other transcontinental railroad companies. The repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act means something far more important to this country than subsidy to ships or railroads. It means the loss of control by America of the Panama Canal and will result in its joint ownership and control with Great Britain. The Sixty-second Congress dealt with the question of Panama Canal tolls. The Sixty-third Congress is called upon to deal with the question of Panama Canal control, which is a far different and far more vital question.

Something has been said here about how men voted in the last Congress, but that is unimportant. We are not concerned with how this man voted or how that man voted on the question of Panama tolls in the last Congress. The important question is, What did Congress do? That which Congress did is what the American people, acting through their legally constituted representatives, have done. If that Congress acted hastily, ill-advisedly, or without full knowledge of the facts; if that Congress made a mistake, we should, by all means, correct it without delay. Was the action of the Sixty-second Congress hasty? Reading the answer to that question from the minority report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I find the following recital of facts:

> It may be well to recall that the original canal bill, provisions of which the majority now seeks to repeal, was reported to the House from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on March 16, 1912. Copies of both the majority and minority reports were placed in the hands of every Member of the House, accompanied by a letter calling attention to the toll section. Two months elapsed before the toll provision was voted upon. The bill was considered in the House six days, a longer period than usually allotted measures other than great appropriation bills. The chief debate was upon the toll provision, our treaty obligations being given full and careful consideration. The bill went to the Senate May 24, and was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. It was there fully discussed and reported from that committee on June 12, passing the Senate on August 9. In the meantime this Government had been officially notified of Great Britain's protest. The exemption clause received a majority of 19 votes in the House. Among those recorded in favor of exemption in the House are Hon. William B. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and Hon. William C. Redfield, both now members of the present Cabinet; Hon. John W. Davis, of West Virginia, selected by President Wilson as Solicitor General of the United States; and Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, since appointed Governor General of the Philippine Islands. In the United States Senate the free-toll provision carried by a majority of 33 votes, and the bill was finally approved by a President whose patriotism, high-mindedness, and regard for sacred treaty obligations no American can question.

What has occurred since this legislation was enacted which gives expression to the views of the American people upon the subject? The Democratic Party held its national convention and in its national platform, which platform was prepared by men now close to the councils of the President, declared in favor of exemption of tolls for coastwise ships. The Republican Party in its convention sanctioned such a policy and the Progressive Party has declared in favor of such a course. The record of the legislation which it is now proposed to repeal discloses the most careful consideration and mature deliberation, and since its passage it has received the sanction of all the great parties which appealed to the electorate in the presidential campaign of 1912. Now, has this Congress come into possession of any facts which were not possessed by the Sixty-second Congress relative to this legislation? Have the American people indicated in any manner that they want this legislation repealed? I challenge the proponents of repeal to answer these questions and present the evidence in support of an affirmative answer, if one is attempted.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of tolls is not a violation of our treaty obligations, and while President Wilson has informed us that this view is not entertained abroad, the solitude of our position need not alarm us as long as it has the approval of the Nation's conscience. It has long been the practice of the Republic to entertain views which were not shared abroad. When the Declaration of Independence was given to the world we were quite alone in entertaining the views therein expressed. Our views were not quite generally shared abroad when we put a stop to the collection of tribute by the pirates of the Barbary coast. England did not share our views when we denied her right to search American ships upon the high seas, and if we want to get into harmony with European opinion on the subject we must promptly abandon the Monroe doctrine. Again, we were quite alone when we sent our brave men to Cuba to consecrate their lives upon the altar of liberty, justice, and humanity on the soil of an alien race.

Mr. Speaker, the history of our country justifies the declaration that we prefer the solitude of righteousness to the noisy tumult and companionship of wrong.

If we can not summon other nations to the support of the proposition that our legislative act has not violated our treaty obligations, we can, however, cite in its support the judgment of the Sixty-second Congress. We can cite the action of President Taft in giving the act the approval of the highest and most honorable position in the world, that of the President of the United States. We can cite the public acts and declarations of Theodore Roosevelt and of Woodrow Wilson while governor of New Jersey. These are men in whose patriotism we all feel a just pride, to whose integrity we all bow, and to whose judgment and convictions the world accords the tribute of respect; and while it is conceivable that they all may be wrong, yet when a foreign government asserts that they are wrong the burden of proof is upon those who make the assertion, and it does not comport with the dignity of American citizenship and manhood to accept, without question and without proof, the adverse judgment of foreign diplomats or potentates upon the public acts of men who have been honored with the highest office in the gift of the American people.

President Wilson in his message to Congress says that—

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether it is right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation, without quibble or hesitation.

I can not accept this doctrine even from a Democratic President. It has no place in the morals of nations or individuals. We must first be just before we can afford to be generous, and no nation should assume a position in its relations with other nations without regard to the question whether such a position is right or wrong. The first test should be, Is it right? and if conscience answers "yes," then that position should be taken without regard to consequences. If President Wilson does not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequences unless we reverse the action of a former administration, will it improve our standing among nations to proclaim that what one administration regards as in perfect harmony with treaty obligations may be repudiated by another as a gross violation of a solemn compact? Shall precedent, which is held in such high esteem in all English and American jurisprudence, be thrown to the winds in our diplomatic negotiations? I hope our Government will never be regarded by the other nations as occupying so unenviable a position.

The clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which, it is claimed by Great Britain, is violated by the act exempting coastwise ships from payment of tolls reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The plain purpose of this section of the treaty is to prevent the use of the canal in such a way as to give to the merchant ships of one country an advantage over the merchant ships of another country in trade competition, and to prevent the warships of one country from acquiring, by means of the canal, any advantage over the warships of another country. Discrimination can be indulged only where there is competition.

The ships engaged in our coastwise trade are not in competition with the ships of other nations. Coastwise traffic is limited to American ships. They are engaged in interstate commerce. A ship taking on its cargo at New York and bound for San Francisco, or vice versa, whether that ship goes by way of Cape Horn or through the Panama Canal, is engaged in interstate commerce—just as much so as if the same cargo was loaded into freight cars at New York and carried across the continent on one of the transcontinental lines. The Constitution of the United States (sec. 8, art. 3) provides that—Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

The position taken by Great Britain with regard to the treaty is not that we are charging higher tolls to British ships than to others; not that we are not charging toll to American ships engaged in foreign trade. The fact is that American ships engaged in foreign trade are charged the same toll as the ships of all other nations. The only ships exempted from toll are those engaged in the coastwise trade—that is to say, ships engaged in interstate commerce—and as to these ships England claims the right, under the clause above quoted of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to make us charge toll. If toll is charged against the ships so engaged in interstate commerce, the beneficiaries of that toll will be the Canadian Pacific Railroad in Canada—hence the British protest—as well as the transcontinental railroads in the United States.

But, dismissing all questions of toll and the beneficiaries of toll charged or exempted, the vital question, stripped of all its verbiage, presented to Congress is this: Will we accede to England's demand that we make the charge of tolls in interstate commerce over the Panama Canal a part of our treaty with her, or will we stand by the Constitution of the United States and reserve the question of charging toll or exemption from toll as one with which the Congress of the United States alone shall deal?

Answering that question on behalf of that constituency by whom I have been commissioned here to act, and for myself, since the canal was built by the American people, with American money, as an American institution, the control of interstate commerce over it will be reserved, under the Constitution, to the Congress of the United States against the protest of any foreign power and will never be surrendered, if surrender be demanded, while there are shots left unfired and Americans living to fire them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is recognized.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to occupy very much time of the House in discussing the Panama tolls question.

Before taking up the subject itself of whether or not we shall repeal the clause exempting American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, let me call attention to a matter that I think is exceedingly important to us all.

Papers and organizations and public speakers are making charges and countercharges against those who advocate the maintenance of the present law and those who favor its repeal. My own conviction is that there is very little basis for charges of unworthy lobbying either in behalf of the measure or against it. Citizens of our country have the right to be heard; they have the right to petition this Congress and the individual Members of the Congress. Sometimes petitioners are governed by unworthy motives; sometimes they are employed on stated salaries; sometimes they become so persistent that they merit the word "lobbyist" used in its opprobrious sense. It may be that both sides of this question are advocated and assailed by all the classes to which I have referred, but it becomes the duty of the Members of this House to exercise their individual conscience and judgment as they consider the question. Numerous letters and petitions have come to me upon both sides of the question, but I know of no one who has made representations either for or against the proposition who is not governed by the highest motives of patriotism and lofty ambition for our country and our country's honor. Certain it is that every person from whom I have received a communication who is personally known to me is a person of the highest integrity and worth.

I recognize that my position upon this question will be supported and opposed in my own State, for from my people I am receiving advice upon both sides of the proposition; but, gentlemen, I think that my people believe in my honesty of purpose, and for that reason it is with confidence that I exercise my judgment, taking it for granted in absolutely assuming that those who may differ from me will entertain for me only the highest respect in that difference.

Nearly two years ago, when I made my campaign for reelection to Congress, I announced my position to the people of my State upon this question. I spoke in many places upon the subject. I was interviewed repeatedly, and declared it as my belief that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty permitted the United States to exercise its discretion with respect to coastwise trade, and could impose tolls upon it or could refuse to impose tolls.

I favored free tolls to American shipping engaged in coastwise trade upon the condition that this privilege should not be granted to transcontinental railroad lines or that the use of the canal would not be granted to these railroads. I took this position, not only because I believed we had the power under the treaty but because we of the West have felt the oppression of high freight rates for a quarter of a century and more and we have looked forward to the time when the Panama Canal would furnish a ready means for competition on some of the heavier articles and commodities that enter into our commerce. I favored denying to the transcontinental railroads the right to use the canal, because I did not want them to at once use the canal to stop competition that otherwise would exist with their own lines. These provisions were written into the law. I can readily see why these interests now favor the repeal of the free-tolls section from a business standpoint. On the other hand, I can see that from a purely business standpoint those engaged in coastwise trade favor the retention of the present law. My own judgment is that upon this basis alone the people of my section of country would be benefited by the law as it now is, rather than by the law as it is sought to be amended.

However, this is not the question that we must consider. The question is one of whether as an honorable people we can maintain the position that Congress took with respect to exempting coastwise shipping under the terms of the treaty.

The treaty is a contract. It is a contract between nations and should be as binding as a contract between citizens. When a difference arises as to the meaning of the words of a contract there are definite methods of determining what the contract really means. One method is to ascertain whether or not there have been similar contracts; and, if so, how they have been construed. Let us apply the same rule here.

There are two provisions of the treaty that are of especial importance in connection with this question. The one clause is that which says:

The United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

The second clause is, section 1, article 3:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Under the foregoing provisions of the treaty, the question is squarely before us: May we exempt our coastwise trade? We have not attempted to exempt our vessels engaged in trade with foreign countries; we have merely exempted coastwise trade. Reading the two provisions of the treaty closely, let us consider whether or not such an exemption constitutes a discrimination against the vessels of other nations, their citizens, or subjects. The type of commerce to which the exemption is granted is that which may be carried on by our own ships alone, and not by the ships of foreign countries. Can it be construed that this is a discrimination against the people of foreign countries? The principle of exempting the vessels engaged in coastwise trade may be wrong, but that is not the question. The question is, Is such trade of a character that if granted free tolls, causes a discrimination against the vessels of foreign countries? The question may very properly be asked: What have foreign countries to do with our coastwise trade?

There are two striking instances where somewhat similar language to that in the treaty has been construed. We have a treaty with Great Britain—a treaty that has existed for many years—that provides that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels other than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

We then passed a law providing for the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from the payment of pilotage charges. Immediately one of the subjects of Great Britain raised the question as to whether or not the law granting the exemption to the vessels of the United States engaged only in coastwise trade from the payment of pilotage charges was not a violation of the old treaty with Great Britain. An action was brought in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332), in which the Supreme Court decided absolutely that there was no merit in the contention that the exemption granted to ships of our own country, when engaged in trade between ports of our own country, was a violation of the treaty with Great Britain. Mr. Justice White, the present Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, rendered the decision, and in that decision he said:

Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel, coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of the vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

Again, the same treaty between Great Britain and the United States granted the same conditions to our ships with respect to British ports as that which was granted in the treaty to British ships with respect to British ports. This treaty was approved in 1815 and is still in force. The language of the treaty is as follows:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports * * * of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Now, what has been the construction of that treaty? Why, for nearly a hundred years Great Britain has granted the minimum harbor and pilotage charges to ships sailing between Ireland and England, England and Scotland, England and the Isle of Man, and vessels engaged in coasting trade generally entering such harbors as Bristol, Liverpool, and London; while, on the other hand, the British Government has consistently charged us rates far in excess of those charged to her own ships flying the British flag. Take the port of Liverpool. Under that treaty English coastwise vessels are charged harbor rates of only 9 cents per ton, while American vessels entering the same harbor are required to pay 33 cents per ton; in other words, 24 cents a ton in excess of that required of the British vessels.

Take the port of Bristol. Great Britain is charging vessels of the United States more than from four to six times the charges made of British vessels in coastwise trade. These are merely examples. I could mention many similar discriminations. And Great Britain is doing this under the treaty that says:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Plainly Great Britain construes that language to refer not to coastwise trade, and plainly the United States has recognized the correctness of the British construction.

We have ceased to protest. We have admitted that when Great Britain guaranteed to us the same harbor rights in Great Britain that she guaranteed to all other nations of the world that she did not include her coastwise trade any more than the coastwise trade of the United States was included in the same treaty with Great Britain or any more than the coastwise trade of the United States is included in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Here is the "deadly parallel." Look at it as you would look at a picture, and then answer whether or not the British contention is right.

THE DEADLY PARALLEL.

TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN OF 1815.	HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.
"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels."	SECTION 1, Article 3. "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Under this treaty, nearly 100 years old, Great Britain charges the United States more than from three to six times the charges made to British vessels engaged in coastwise trade. Great Britain believes this complies with the treaty and we have conceded the point.

Under this treaty Great Britain asks that a different construction be placed upon the English language, and that coastwise trade of the United States be not exempt.

WHAT THOSE WHO FRAMED THE TREATY THOUGHT OF IT.

Again, I find that in deciding any question where there is a conflict of opinion as to the construction of language used it is well, if possible, to ascertain the opinion of those who had part in framing the language. The particular language used and to which I have referred was not framed carelessly or as the result of an accident, but it was framed after due deliberation and earnest debate. The treaty itself was the subject of extended debate in the Senate of the United States. At that time Senator Bard, of California, offered an amendment to the treaty, providing specifically for the exemption of coastwise trade. This amendment was rejected by a vote of 27 yeas to 43 nays. On the same day an amendment was offered reserving to the United States the right to protect the canal in any way it might deem proper. This amendment was also rejected by a vote of 27 yeas to 44 nays. Both of these amendments were rejected because Members of the Senate believed that there was in the language which was embodied in the present treaty sufficient authority to protect and fortify the canal and to favor vessels engaged in coastwise trade without specific authority. Senator Bard, in commenting on this particular feature of the subject, said:

When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment.

Senator Foraker was a member of that body, and he said:

According to my recollection this very question (of right to discriminate in favor of our own ships) was raised by an amendment offered to the treaty, which amendment was voted down overwhelmingly, because it was thought unnecessary to specify that a provision of such a character did not apply to us who were building the canal, and were to have with respect to it the usual rights of ownership and all the rights of regulation.

Senator LODGE was chairman of the committee that reported the treaty, and in commenting upon what his understanding was he said:

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

Hon. Charles A. Towne was a Member of the United States Senate from the State of Minnesota. He said:

I remember distinctly my own feeling about the matter at the time, which was that we retained under the treaty full sovereignty over the canal and over the incidents of its ownership and control, including the right to fortify and police it and to regulate its use by vessels of commerce, subject only to the condition that all other nations should be treated alike, and that this was the general understanding.

Hon. George Turner, of the State of Washington, had no doubt that it was the contention of the United States in making the treaty to reserve to itself the right to handle as it might think fit our coastwise trade. He declared:

My recollection of the view taken in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is substantially similar to that of Senators LODGE, Bard, CLAPP, PERKINS, Davis, and others. I am certain the treaty would not have been ratified if there had been doubt in the mind of anybody that the treaty limited the United States in the use which it might make of its own canal for its own purposes. The fact that the canal was to be the exclusive property of the United States, and under its absolute control for all purposes of war and peace, subject, of course, to fair dealing as between all other nations, was the controlling factor in the ratification of the treaty Of this there can be no doubt.

So I could continue and I could give the judgment of many more men who were identified with the making of this treaty as to the meaning of the language used at the time the treaty was entered into.

Theodore Roosevelt must have understood thoroughly the intention of the administration in entering into the agreement with Great Britain, and he believed that it provided for the exemption of coastwise trade. Here are his words as used in his letter of acceptance of the Republican nomination for President in 1904:

I believe that the position of the United States [as to the Panama Canal] is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation. No ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is to the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find such great and expensive work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, as generously put at the service of all mankind.

President Taft was called upon to consider the language used in the treaty. In his message to Congress of August 18, 1912, Mr. Taft said:

After full examination of the treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

I could continue much further, but I have tried to give merely the opinions of those who were prominently identified with the making of the treaty or its interpretation to ascertain, if possible, what their judgment was when the treaty was entered into.

I desire, however, to call attention to the fact that the people of the United States, without discrimination of party, have quite generally approved of this same general interpretation. The Democratic Party on July 2, 1912, in its national platform, declared that—and then President Wilson, some six weeks later, on August 16, 1912, made an address to a gathering of New Jersey farmers, in speaking of the trade of coastwise steamers, in which he said:

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that don't you?

He then, in that same speech, declared with reference to the toll plank in the platform, as though to make it more emphatic:

Our platform is not molasses, to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says.

The Progressive platform of 1912 declared:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break the transportation monopoly, now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads, by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned and controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

To quote from Hon. Bainbridge Colby, one of the Progressive leaders of the country, in an address delivered in New York on March 20, 1914—

This was the declaration of the Progressive Party in its platform, which was described as a solemn contract between the party and the people by its candidate for the presidency, Theodore Roosevelt.

The Republican Party seems not to have made a declaration on this subject, other than to affirm what it had done, taking it for granted that its position was well known.

In the face of all this, we are asked to repeal the provision of the law and do exactly opposite from that which was promised to the people by the Democratic Party, by the Progressive Party, and reaffirmed by the Republican Party.

Frankly, if it were not for the policy of our Government in construing similar language, and its interpretation by the Supreme Court, and the policy of the British Government in interpreting similar language, as applied to our shipping entering British ports, and if it were not for the opinions of eminent American citizens who had part in the framing of that treaty, I would say that, from the language itself that has been used, there is reasonable doubt as to the meaning. But in the face of the understanding of the representatives of our Government, who made the treaty, in the face of the policy of our Government and the policy of Great Britain in interpreting similar language in other treaties, I am not able to see why the United States should now surrender for all time all right and authority over the control of the trade of the canal, and to concede to the world that we, the Nation that built the canal, have no particular rights or benefits other than the right to expend millions of dollars for the construction of this great work.

This canal will cost the United States Government more than $400,000,000. If we shall fortify the canal, it will cost us millions upon millions of dollars in addition to this. The treaty that we made with Great Britain guaranteed to us "all the rights incident to construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

What does that guaranty mean? What are our special rights? Are they merely the right to expend this vast sum of money? Probably not for many years will the canal do a business sufficient to pay the expenses of its operation and interest upon the investment made by our Government.

Is another one of the rights of our Government the right of suffering the loss of interest to our people on an expenditure of more than $400,000,000? True, there is glory in building the canal. There is distinction to our Nation in accomplishing so great a work; but when rights and privileges were guaranteed to us, it would seem that these rights and guaranties should mean more than rhetoric, and that they should mean something akin to that which is included in the law which we are asked now to repeal.

It is asked that we repeal this law, because it is alleged our Government should not give even this small aid to coastwise shipping that will carry the products of the West to the eastern markets and the commodities produced in the East to our people in the West. President Wilson in his campaign in 1912 thought that it was of great advantage that this encouragement be given.

This is a similar kind of encouragement that our Government has always given when it has expended moneys for the improvement of harbors, for the deepening of water channels, for the betterment of our waterways. If it is wrong in principle to let vessels engaged in coastwise trade pass through the Panama Canal and regard the canal as part of our coast line, then it is wrong to improve the Mississippi River and permit vessels to ply it without paying toll; it is wrong to improve the Columbia River for the use of the people of the Northwest without they pay toll; it was wrong to have built the locks at the Cascades, notwithstanding that this great work has already saved to the people of the Northwest millions of dollars in freight rates; and it is wrong to build the locks at Celilo, which will likewise save millions of dollars to our people and constitute a regulator of transportation conditions. Wrong, I say, unless we shall charge tolls for the use of the rivers that we improve, the lakes and canals that we build, the harbors that we deepen and make available for use.

I admit that it would be wrong to improve a great waterway within the United States and turn over the use of the waterway to a railroad company whose lines parallel the channel, and which could thereby prevent the waterway from being used in the reduction of transportation rates. But that has not been our policy. Our policy has been to improve our waterways in order that there may be competition, and in order that rates may be driven down to the lowest reasonable level. In the Panama tolls law I stood for denying the use of the Panama Canal to the transcontinental railroads of the United States upon any conditions, because I did not believe we should place it in the power of the railroads to subvert one of the great purposes in building the canal by holding up the transportation rates.

I stood for granting the exemption of tolls to those ships engaged in coastwise trade that thereby the greatest competition could prevail, and that thereby the Panama Canal, constructed at the cost of nearly a half billion of dollars, might be made to yield the fruits and benefits to the people of the East and of the West, that have borne the burden of its construction, to which they are entitled.

This was good Republican doctrine two years ago; it was good Democratic doctrine two years ago; it was good Progressive doctrine two years ago. It was the pledge that I made to the people who elected me, and it is the principle that I believe ought to be sustained by the American Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OGLESBY] is recognized.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Speaker, aside from fixing $1.25 as the maximum and 75 cents as the minimum rates per net registered ton that may be charged vessels of commerce passing through the Panama Canal, the sole provision of the bill now under consideration is to strike from the canal regulation act of 1912 the words:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The sole question in dispute is, Shall we exempt vessels engaged in our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls for passage through the Panama Canal and pay the consequent deficit in fixed charges and cost of operation and maintenance of the canal out of the National Treasury, or shall we require all vessels using the canal to pay for such use on equal terms?

Into the discussion of this question many collateral and wholly irrelevant issues have been injected. On last Saturday my distinguished colleague [Mr. FITZGERALD] in an address, easily the most comprehensive and scholarly so far delivered in opposition to this bill, stated:

As a participant in the legislation for the construction of the canal I unhesitatingly assert that the Congress sought chiefly these purposes: (a) To provide effective competition with the transcontinental railroads; (b) to increase the efficiency of our naval forces; (c) to prevent the control of an isthmian canal by a European power.

The railroads can not even now compete in rates with vessels, and can therefore handle no coast-to-coast traffic, except where time in delivery is of greater importance than cost of transportation. The opening of the Panama Canal will greatly reduce the cost in time and money of transportation by water between our east and our west coasts, and the difference between the actual cost of water transportation then and the lowest rates possible by the transcontinental railroads will be many times the maximum of the tolls permitted if the pending measure becomes a law. The only competition that will affect rates will be between the vessels themselves, and if the present coastwise shipping monopoly continues rates will continue to be fixed at what the traffic will bear.

If vessels engaged in our coastwise trade were under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and their rates subject to regulation thereby, there might be some excuse for the toll exemption, on the ground that a considerable portion of our people would derive the benefit of a saving in transportation charges. But in the absence of any provision for rate regulation the money saved by their being allowed to use the canal free would be pocketed by the owners of such vessels.

I have listened attentively to my colleague and to the very able and distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I believe to practically every Member who has spoken in opposition to this bill, and have yet to hear a single fact showing that any purpose stated by them as sought to be accomplished by this country in building the canal would be adversely affected by the repeal of that provision of our law exempting vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. Nor is there one fact in the RECORD to show that in passing this bill we will be surrendering to England or to any foreign country any right which we now have.

I favor this measure wholly on economic grounds. I believe we have the right to exempt our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls and should favor such exemption if I believed it to be to our advantage.

I am more than willing to say to England and other foreign nations that we of this Democratic Congress are repealing this free-tolls provision to make our laws square with our time-honored opposition to subsidy and to special privilege. In my opinion, since that question has been raised, a fair and honorable way to give such notice would be by inserting a declaration to that effect, expressed in unmistakable terms, into this bill. If the opponents of this measure who have so vociferously denounced the repeal of the exemption clause as a dishonorable surrender to England will incorporate in their motion to recommit this bill the further proposition that it be again reported with an amendment embodying a declaration such as I have indicated I shall gladly support it. If you mean or believe what you have been saying, you will propose such an amendment reasonably free from pullbacks. If you do not mean what you say and are in reality only simulating excessive patriotism for home consumption, or trying to embarrass the President for petty party advantage, or because you are in sympathy with the coastwise shipping monopoly and its allies or other special interests, you will load your motion to recommit so it will not be safe for an honest man to fool with it.

Many warm personal friends and men for whose ability, integrity, and patriotism I have the highest regard have expressed very strong convictions against the wisdom of the passage of this act, and it causes me greater regret than I like to admit that we do not view the matter in the same light. But if we are to remain a people of self-government we must recognize our responsibility as individuals, not only to our districts but to our country, and that upon each of us the country has a right to depend for an honest exercise of our individual judgment, for an intelligent recognition of our constitutional privileges, and for a conscientious discharge of the duties of citizenship, whether or not we are acting in a representative capacity. This responsibility can not be shifted, however much we may wish it, nor is this duty performed by accepting even the mature and well-considered opinions of others, however able, experienced, and honest.

I shall vote in favor of this bill because as the law now stands the money will have to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the expense that should be paid by the shipowners for passage of their ships through the canal, and every cent of the money thus saved will go into their own pockets.

The Hon. Martin J. Keogh, one of the ablest and most loved judges who ever graced the bench in the State of New York, recently stated, in the course of an important trial, "There is but one point in any case." We should not be influenced in our action by sneering references to patronage or unsupported and unfounded assertions that we are surrendering some right we now possess of value to this country at the behest of a foreign power, whether such references or assertions are made by honest friends, cunning enemies, or the representatives of greedy special interests. Let us base our decision on the issue as presented in the bill under consideration, the one point in the case.

The free-tolls plank should present no difficulty to us other than the difficulty of understanding how this rotten special-privilege timber found its way into a Democratic platform. The same platform declares against subsidies, bounties, and special privileges. The two provisions are hopelessly inconsistent, and if of equally legitimate origin would nullify each other. But they are not. For my part, I choose to stand on that plank hewn from the Jeffersonian oak of equal rights to all, which has been seasoned by a hundred years of exposure to the sunlight of public opinion, and which is worn hard as iron by the feet of the thousands who have marched to victory in our battles for the people against the special interests under the banner of Democracy.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that partisan politics has been allowed to enter into this controversy. If there ever was a question before Congress in which Members should vote as judges rather than politicians, it is the issue now before us, an issue in which the good opinion of mankind toward the American Government is at stake.

The simple question is, Shall we live up to our treaty obligations? It is a question of foreign politics, and in such an emergency I am determined to vote as an American rather than as a partisan; and though not of the President's party, I shall vote to uphold the President's hands. [Applause.] Yes; I should probably do so even if there was doubt in my own mind as to the wisdom of his course, in order to demonstrate to the country and the world my implicit confidence, at least, in the integrity and patriotism of an American President in his dealing with the rest of the world. [Applause.]

My service here, too, the same as that of the gentleman from Alabama, extends from the one Democratic administration to the other. In those 20 years I have seen Republicans stand by President Cleveland in his Venezuelan policy and I have seen Democrats willingly uphold the hands of Republican Presidents in the many foreign complications during the 16 years of Republican rule. I do not want it said at the end of my congressional career that I was less patriotic than those examples taught me to be. [Applause.] These are the occasions, Mr. Speaker, when our Americanism, the faith in ourselves, is put to the test. Or is it your opinion that the "red-blooded" Americanism to which my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] referred the other day means merely readiness to fight or taking a position which must ultimately lead to war? Let me remind those who hold this opinion that it nearly always requires more moral courage to do justice in order that peace may be preserved than to rush heedlessly into a bloody conflict. [Applause.] And, what is more, to risk a fight for an alleged advantage which, in the opinion of an American President, does not justly belong to us would not be a display of red-blooded Americanism, but a crime. [Applause.]

It is true that the President has changed his opinion on this question, for as a candidate he has asked for the exemption of our coastwise shipping, while as President he now insists on enforcing the opposite policy. In my judgment, this change of front makes his present position the stronger and more persuasive, for besides meeting the objections of the no-toll advocates he had to overcome himself. [Applause.] Surely the most cogent reasons, the most compelling necessity alone, could have caused such a conversion. I know how it is myself. Two years ago I voted for free tolls on the supposition that it would involve no treaty violation and, moreover, greatly benefit the American people. Upon closer investigation I found I was mistaken in both respects; that not only would exemption violate our contract with Great Britain, but that a construction of the contract in the sense in which the whole world construes it would also be of vastly greater advantage to the American people than a subsidy to our coastwise shipping could possibly be. [Applause.] As I would rather be right than consistent, I do not feel the slightest hesitation to reverse my position. In fact, I should despise myself if I did not vote strictly in accordance with the convictions which I have formed as a result of a conscientious study of the question.

It may not be out of place to tell the story of my conversion. It will enable us "to see ourselves as others see us." How otherwise, except by personal contact with other peoples, can we find out their opinions about the United States? The foreign diplomats accredited to our Government wisely refrain from telling us, and but very few of us read foreign newspapers.

Yet, "to know thyself" is a gift admittedly as beneficial to whole nations as it is to individuals. The only way, it seems, to learn foreign opinion is to travel yourselves.

It so happened that shortly after Congress had voted, two years ago, to exempt our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls I attended with other Members of this body the Interparliamentary Conference, at Geneva, Switzerland. There were members of probably 20 different parliaments assembled, most of whom I had met many times before. I noticed at once that we Americans were not received with the same degree of cordiality as formerly, and I naturally made inquiries. Everyone to whom I spoke had the same complaint to make, namely, that the United States had broken her word with England. "You Americans make bargains, and then don't live up to them," was the consensus of opinion. One of the delegates, a prominent statesman in his country, and not an Englishman, broke bread with me, and during the meal went over the whole history of the Panama Canal; how we had promised to dedicate the canal to the whole world as a benefit to be shared equally by all nations, and for the free use of all in time of peace as well as war, and how, after we had thrown Great Britain out of the partnership, we were now trying to filch a petty advantage out of our ownership in spite of our high-sounding promises. "Evidently," he said, "your statesmen have totally overlooked the fact that that part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which, dealing with the United States alone, guarantees the use of the canal to all nations and says there shall be no discrimination, is not a single-handed decree of your Government, but a joint agreement which England might have rejected and probably would have rejected if the United States had insisted on the exemption of her coastwise shipping at that time." It is needless to say that I defended my country as best I could, but what could I say when another delegate pointed to our treatment of Colombia? In the treaty of 1846, he said, we had guaranteed to that country absolute integrity of her territory; instead, we had calmly allowed Panama to secede, and when Colombia had tried to get back her lost Province we had interceded and cited against her the very same treaty whose violation we had permitted, protesting that free communication over the Isthmus was obstructed by Colombia's acts of self-defense. At the time I did not know that we were willing to make reparation to Colombia, but volunteered the statement that the American people would not tolerate any wrong to anybody.

And this is not the whole story. Last year, when I attended the Interparliamentary Conference at The Hague, one of the delegates informed me that a certain great power would not enter into an arbitration treaty with us, because, in the opinion of its statesmen, we were unable, under our system of government, to uphold the integrity of a treaty if anyone of the several States saw fit to violate it by its own independent legislation. This, of course, has reference to the California school and land questions, and was no news to me, except so far as my friend expressed the reluctance of the other Governments, under these circumstances, to enter into treaty relations with us at all.

In the light of these revelations, Mr. Speaker, there seems no longer anything mysterious in the words of the President's message that without the repeal of the free tolls section he would be unable to deal with other matters "of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence." He can not well say it himself, but we can freely express it here, that he is handicapped in his conduct of our foreign affairs. As a result of our canal policy the sentiment of the whole world has turned against us, and, step by step, he is confronted by the skepticism and distrust of all the other governments of the earth. Why, a blind man can see it even without the President furnishing a bill of particulars. We have recently made a simple proposition to the other nations, to the effect that in case of a controversy between us there shall always be an investigation before hostilities are resorted to. The plan is so simple and at the same time so reasonable that no well-meaning government having the cause of peace at heart could well refuse to clasp hands with us. Yet, up to this moment not a single one of the greater powers has seen fit to do so. We have not been rebuffed outright, but, while expressing platonic sympathy with our proposal, these powers keep aloof from us. Does not this speak volumes for the present state of the international mind?

It is fortunate, Mr. Speaker, that the interpretation of treaties is not the function of legislative bodies, fortunate for the peace of the world. If it was, wars would never end and blood would constantly flow everywhere, as it does in unfortunate Mexico now. If the Alabama case, for instance, had been submitted to the American Congress and the English Parliamen, I am almost certain there would have been war between the two countries, for each side would have insisted on its so-called rights. It is the experience of history that national legislative bodies usually take a selfish view of international questions, a view looking to local advantage, and, consequently, they always conjure up the danger of war. The present controversy is a case in point. I firmly believe, if it were not for the influence of the President, this House would overwhelmingly uphold the local and selfish view of the case. Of course, in this instance, there would be no war, but that would not be the fault, or, I should rather say, it would not be to the credit of the jingoes. It would be due to those men who, by persistent and patriotic efforts in the interest of world peace, have succeeded in establishing a world tribunal to settle differences just as the present one. But let me go a little further: I admit it to be quite natural that a legislative body, acting independently of all outside considerations, would decide such questions with a view to national advantage, but in the present instance the case is different. We are not acting on a measure which the President, from a larger viewpoint, might veto, but we are acting on an appeal made to us by the President to do a certain thing in the interest of our foreign relations. As the President, under the Constitution, is the guardian of our foreign interests and, as such, naturally takes a broader view of things, it would be tantamount to doubting his patriotism and loyalty if we refused to listen to his advice.

Of course we have the abstract right to do as we please. We can interpret any treaty to our liking. We can strut around with a chip on our shoulder and, relying on our position of geographic isolation, brusquely ask the world, "What are you going to do about it"? Such provocation might not lead to war, but our jingoes would stand convicted of an attempt at inviting it, and the situation resulting from such action would, in fact, be as bad as war. And how would this attitude of the American Congress harmonize with our leadership in the cause of arbitration and peace? Would not all the world be justified in its skepticism of our uprightness? Would not the nations say, and justly so, that our professions in behalf of international peace agreements were mere hypocritical sham and pretense? Surely the peace movement of which this country was the most advanced advocate would be dead, and I say a dozen Panama Canals would not compensate us for its doom. No. Mr. Speaker, as big and powerful as we are, we can not afford to defy the world. When this Republic was born its first intelligent utterance was a promise of "decent respect to the opinion of mankind." In the meantime the world has grown smaller and smaller. Political isolation to-day is as impossible as commercial isolation. Nations are no longer independent of each other, but interdependent, and even in matters of legislation they can not with impunity follow their selfish impulses, but must have decent regard for the feelings of their neighbors. In fact, it may truly be said that in all questions not exclusively local governments are now largely guided by international considerations. In other words, the pendulum of evolution swings perceptibly in the direction of the solidarity of the human family, and an act of selfishness on the part of any government will be resented by all others.

Moreover, this is a commercial age, with each nation the customer of the other. At the Panama Canal all the world will soon be our customer, and in order to make our canal investment pay we must treat our customer with the same consideration with which a private business man treats his. But if our patrons find they are being discriminated against, in violation of a solemn compact, do you not believe with me that we will be cutting into our own flesh, and will eventually lose vastly more than can possibly be gained by granting an unauthorized free pass to a special interest? The Suez Canal Co., according to reports, is paying from 20 to 30 per cent dividends. A small reduction of the tolls for the use of that competitive route would leave us high and dry as far as foreign shipping is concerned.

These considerations lead me to the purely economic and domestic side of the question. While this phase is insignificant as compared with the treaty issue, it must be discussed as showing what a poor excuse the alleged advantage to the United States really is for so serious an offense as the infringement of a treaty. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate long before I would vote for the exemption of our coastwise shipping even if there was no treaty imposing indiscriminate tolls. In the first place my section of the country—the great Middle West—will derive no benefit whatever from such a grant to a special interest running ships up and down the two coasts and through the Panama Canal. Owing to the refusal of Congress to deepen the Mississippi we have no steamers which could partake of the benefit. But I can well see how my constituents might be called upon to dive into their pockets in order to make up the deficit caused by the remission of tolls.

It is estimated that the annual revenue to be derived from coastwise ships would amount, exclusive of interest on investment, to from one to one and a half million dollars, or about one-half of the operating expenses of the canal. If this is remitted, the deficit must be raised by taxation, and this means that all the people of the country will be called upon to pay out of their pockets what goes to a private interest—an interest which under our laws enjoys an exclusive monopoly, and even now is paying immense dividends to its stockholders. It is a subsidy pure and simple. Now, I am not opposed to proper subsidies, but even the wildest subventionist would probably never dream of granting a subsidy to a fattened monopoly such as I have just described. If subsidies are to be granted, they should be given to the ships engaged in the foreign trade of the United States; the ships which, without any aid or protection, carry our flag to distant ports in competition with the ships of all the nations, under threatened exclusion by rings, pools, and combines, and with little hope of a profitable return cargo. [Applause.] Yet, such a ship will be charged about $6,000 for passing through the canal, while the coastwise ships of the Standard Oil Co. and the Steel Trust are carried through at the expense of the Treasury absolutely free. I have not the slightest doubt that my constituents as well as yours, when they once fully understand this situation, will applaud everyone for voting to repeal such an unjust law.

The advocates of free tolls or no tolls, as appears from this brief explanation, are really contending for an unworthy object. But whether they fight for a real advantage or merely a shadow is, after all, unimportant. The main question is: Have we a moral and legal right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of ourselves? The moral right may well be questioned after all the promises and assurances which American Presidents and statesmen have given to the world during the last hundred years. It might be argued that even if we had the undisputed legal right to preferential treatment, it would pay us to be generous and not to disappoint the expectation of mankind that the Panama Canal was to be a free and open highway to bring remote nations and peoples into closer relation with one another; that it should be dedicated to the commerce of the world as an exalted agency of peace, in the control of a liberty-loving people, for the promotion of human happiness and the spread of the blessings of civilization. This is my conception of it, Mr. Speaker; and what is more, it agrees with my definition of the treaty. I have no quarrel with those who construe it differently, but doubt the wisdom of their zeal and deplore their unwillingness to be swayed by more magnanimous impulses. The bone of contention is the following paragraph of the Hay-Paunceforte treaty:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Treaties must be interpreted in the light of their history. The project of an isthmian canal is as old as the Government itself. As early as 1826 Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, wrote, in connection with the International American Conference at Panama, that "the vast object (the canal), if it should ever be accomplished, will be interesting to all parts of the world"; and he added significantly, "the benefit of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls." In 1839 the House of Representatives—the Senate having acted four years previously—adopted a resolution requesting the President to open negotiations with other Governments with a view to the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and "of securing forever the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations." In every official and unofficial pronouncement touching the canal the equal rights of all nations was emphasized. It was also embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty just quoted. The only question is, Does "all nations" mean all nations save one? I can not and will not interpret it that way. I resent the idea that where an international document speaks of "all nations" the United States should be excluded. Much stress is laid by the exemptionists on the fact that while the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 provided for a partnership between the United States and Great Britain the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1891 placed the United States alone in charge of the project; and from this it is argued that article 3, in which the United States adopted the Suez Canal rules, does not apply to all nations but to the other nations. Our friends overlook the fact that even where the treaty speaks of the United States alone the language represents the agreement of both nations; that, in other words, it is a concurrent resolution of the Governments of both the United States and Great Britain, and not the exclusive dictum of the owner of the canal. Would Great Britain, after she had given way to us in every particular on the supposition that there would be no discrimination against her, have ever consented to an exceptional advantage in favor of our coastwise shipping trust if we had announced such an intention during the negotiations? I will never believe it, especially because the resulting hole in the canal revenues, if not to be made good by the American taxpayers, would of necessity have to be filled through an increase of the tolls for the rest of the shipping.

The subject is not as obscure as some of our friends want to make us believe. On the contrary, the United States entered freely and openly into these treaties, and the situation is one, as Mr. Charlemagne Tower recently said at the Lake Mohonk conference, which we have created for ourselves. We negotiated with Great Britain always with the understanding upon our part that she was to be on the same footing as ourselves in regard to the canal; and she accepted, yielding the advantages that she had acquired, in order to comply with our plans. It is not a question now as to whether we made a good bargain or a bad one, but it is of great importance to the American people that the United States Government shall fulfill its engagements and shall carry out loyally its international obligations.

Unfortunately, both Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote, who negotiated the treaty, are dead, but there is an eye-witness still living in the person of Mr. Joseph H. Choate, who, as our ambassador to Great Britain at the time the treaty was concluded, was in constant intercourse with both of these statesmen, as well as with Lord Lansdowne, concerning the purpose and meaning of every point in the treaty. No other living American has such accurate knowledge upon these points, and to most serious persons his reflected declarations that it never entered the thought of the framers of the treaty that the reference in it to "all nations" meant or could be construed to mean all nations except the United States will be conclusive as to the interpretation of the phrase. In his address at Washington, December 4, 1913, to which I had the honor to listen, Mr. Choate said:

> Lord Pauncefote and Secretary Hay were two of the noblest, truest, and purest statesmen on earth. It never crossed the minds of either of them or of myself that the treaty ever meant anything else than exactly what it says.

Then, speaking of the action of Congress exempting our coastwise shipping, he continued:

> This has created a situation that has raised the distrust of foreign nations of our willingness to stand by the treaties we made. There are two ways out of it, one of which I hope will be adopted—that is, to repeal the eighth clause of the Panama Canal act. We will dispose of the matter that way, and leave it where it was. Another way is to arbitrate the question as quickly and effectively as possible. You can not expect nations to enter into any arrangement or negotiations with us for the judicial settlement of international disputes unless they are satisfied, as they were always satisfied until a year or two ago, that the United States is ready to stand by its word.

Mr. Speaker, in view of this authoritative statement, if there was any doubt in my mind as to the meaning of the treaty, I would resolve it in favor of American magnanimity. I should have much preferred to see the whole matter sent to The Hague, but as there is no such alternative presented I shall cast my lot with those who construe the contract in accordance with the undivided sentiment of the civilized world, with America's traditional generosity, and the international grandeur of the canal as an equal benefit to all mankind. [Applause.] And when the faint-hearted economist asks about our return for the vast outlay, my answer will be that with a guaranty of equal treatment of all nations, ourselves included, the canal will be an asset worth a hundred times its cost. It will sustain the world's confidence in American fair play, it will make unnecessary the building of additional battleships, will confirm American leadership in the cause of international justice and peace, dispel the clouds from our horizon, and will tend to increase to proportions now unthought of our commerce with the countries brought nearer to us by means of the canal, and with all the world. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill, though I regret that it is not open to amendment, for I believe, if it was, a much better bill would pass than is now possible.

Within the time allotted me, I can not go into an extended discussion of the questions involved; and even though I had the time, I would not care to do so, not wishing to indulge in repetition of what others have said in this debate, and said better, perhaps, than I could.

I regret that the consideration of this bill is not approached with that temperateness of mind, that exercise of deliberate judgment that the importance of the question demands, and I would first say a word to my Republican colleagues in this regard.

We all see that here is an opportunity to weaken our Democratic opponents and add to their present troubles by solidly voting against this bill. But considerations of partisan advantage have no place upon this floor in the consideration of a question of such tremendous importance as this. [Applause.] We who are Republicans can only serve our party when we vote for what we believe to be the best interests of our common country. If, in the judgment of any Member, this bill is right and ought to pass, he violates his oath of office if he votes against it for mere partisan advantage.

I regret the manner in which this matter is presented to the Congress by the President of the United States. It could not have been presented in any way more certain to arouse prejudice against the bill and resentment against what from the President's message alone might be considered an abject surrender to the demands of a foreign nation. But the manner of the presentation of the question to Congress should not deter us from voting upon this bill solely upon its merits irrespective of any other consideration.

I voted against the exemption of coastwise shipping from tolls when the Panama Canal act was originally passed. I did so then primarily upon economic grounds. I then believed that the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was doubtful. Upon the economic side of the question my opinion has not changed. It has been said that whatever the correct economic position may be, that should not enter into our deliberations upon this bill, because we ought not to allow any foreign nation to influence our economic policies.

With this view I can not agree, for to my mind any Member who believes that the exemption of coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls is economically unsound but proposes to vote against this bill solely because Great Britain is opposed to this exemption is permitting a foreign nation to influence our economic policy just as much in one direction as it is in the other. [Applause.] If this exemption is wrong, Great Britain's being opposed to it does not make it right, and I am not willing to vote to continue a policy that I believe to be wrong merely out of resentment to Great Britain or the President of the United States. [Applause.]

That the exemption of coastwise traffic from tolls is economically unsound and is certainly an injury to the people of a large part of the interior of the United States, and probably an injury to all of the people of the United States except the owners of ships engaged in coastwise traffic, seems very clear to me. This has already been fully discussed, especially by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

I have stated that when the Panama Canal act was passed, while I was clear that the exemption of coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls was economically unsound, at that time I believed the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was doubtful and debatable. Since that time, because of some evidence that has come to my attention, I am clearly of the opinion that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not permit the exemption which it is now proposed to repeal.

As we all know, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It will be remembered that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 was preceded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900, which treaty was submitted to the Senate of the United States, and upon consideration of which it proposed certain amendments thereto. The provision of the present treaty which bears upon the question before us is article 3, and especially section 1 of that article.

The question at issue, it is conceded by all, is, first, whether the term "all nations" includes the United States, and, second, if it does so include the United States, whether the exemption of our coastwise traffic from tolls constitutes any discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Does the term in section 1 "all nations" include the United States? Whether it does or not, I submit, depends upon the understanding of the respective contracting parties at the time the treaty was made. If there was agreement between them at that time as to the proper construction of these words, then that construction is binding upon us now.

I have said that the Senate proposed certain amendments to the treaty of 1900. There was one amendment which was adopted by the Senate which, to my mind, conclusively settles the question that the term "all nations," used alike in both the treaty of 1900 and 1901, did include the United States. That amendment is known as the Davis amendment, and was adopted by a vote of 65 to 17. It reads as follows:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

The Senate said in that amendment that paragraph 1 of article 2 of the treaty of 1900, which is substantially paragraph 1, article 3, of the treaty of 1901, should not apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order. Can anything be clearer that in the minds of the Senate the term "all nations" in paragraph 1 did include the United States, and that in order to protect the United States a reservation relating to that paragraph was necessary?

Now, if we will follow the diplomatic correspondence succeeding the adoption of this amendment and leading up to the negotiations of the treaty of 1901, it is entirely clear that in the minds of both parties the term "all nations" did include the United States. This amendment was objected to by Great Britain, and the ground of objection was stated in a memorandum prepared by Secretary of State Hay and sent to the Senate in connection with the submission of the treaty of 1901. I quote from that memorandum, as follows:

This amendment—

The one which I have just read—

was strenuously objected to by Great Britain as involving a distinct departure from the principle of neutrality which had theretofore found acceptance by both Governments, inasmuch as it would, as construed by Lord Landsdowne, permit the United States, in time of peace as well as in time of war, to resort to whatever warlike acts it pleased in and near the canal, which would be clearly inconsistent with its intended neutral character and would deprive the commerce and navies of the world of the free use of it.

The objection of Great Britain was met by our Government through proposals to modify the wording of the treaty, not in the least affecting the construction of the term "all nations," but by striking out of paragraph 1 the words "in time of war as in time of peace" and by relieving Great Britain from the duty which was imposed upon it by the treaty of 1900 of jointly enforcing the neutrality of the canal with the United States. Mr. Hay, in his memorandum, states this in the following words:

No longer insisting upon the language of the Davis amendment—which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense, which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1 that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to and that war between the contracting parties or between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

That this change was not intended in the least degree to change the construction of the term "all nations" is further indicated from the memorandum of Secretary Hay, as follows:

With the exception of these changes care was taken in the draft of the new treaty to preserve the exact language, which has passed both the Senate and the British Government without objection and, as is believed, without criticism.

It is therefore entirely clear that in construing the language of this treaty previous to its final negotiation both the United States and Great Britain clearly understood that the term "all nations" did include the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not the time to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, this construction is further supported by reference to rule 2 of article 3, immediately following the one which I have discussed. This reads as follows:

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

Now, if the United States in adopting these rules did not understand that the rules should apply to us, will some gentleman tell us why this reservation to the United States of the right to maintain military police along the canal, and so forth, was made? If these rules were adopted to be applied only to other nations, there was certainly no necessity for reserving any right to the United States in the rules themselves.

Assuming then, as I think we must, that the term "all nations" does include the United States, and assuming further for the purpose of this argument that though the United States is included, we still have the right to exempt our coastwise traffic from tolls, provided there is no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise, I submit that the exemption of coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls is such discrimination as is prohibited in the treaty.

The contention is made that there can be no discrimination against other nations or its citizens or subjects because they are prohibited from entering into our coastwise traffic at all. Let me give an illustration of what may readily occur if this bill does not pass. Two ships, one an American bottom and the other an English bottom, take on cargoes at Seattle, Wash., both of the same commodity; both pass through the Panama Canal. The English bottom pays tolls; the American bottom is exempt. The American bottom is destined for Portland, Me., the English bottom for Montreal, Canada. The cargo of the English ship is owned by Canadians and that of the American ship owned by our own citizens. We will assume that they are competing with each other in the markets of the interior of Canada. The American cargo is shipped from Portland to the interior of Canada, and when it crosses the line pays the Canadian duty. The English cargo pays the same duty when the cargo is landed at Montreal. But when it comes to competing in the markets of Canada in the sale of these two cargoes, the cargo coming in the English ship is handicapped in that competition by exactly the amount of the tolls paid for passing through the Panama Canal. Does not this constitute a discrimination that is prohibited by the treaty? It is entirely clear to me that it does, and other illustrations might be given.

If I am correct, then, in the construction of the treaty, what is our duty, regardless of what views we may hold upon the economic principles involved? Much loose language has been indulged in to the effect that this is our canal, the ships are ours, and we have a right to do with our own as we please. When the time comes to exempt ships from tolls, if this bill shall not pass, the owner of the ships will say, "The canal is yours" to the people of the United States, "but the ships are mine." The canal is ours, but we have made a solemn treaty with another nation as to how we and all other nations shall use it, and we have no more right to violate that contract than has a private individual to violate any contract that he may make with his fellow man.

It is said that the honor of the Nation is here involved. It is. But not in the sense that the opponents of this bill state. The honor of the Nation is involved in that its duty is to preserve inviolate every agreement that it has made and live up to the terms of a solemn treaty which it has entered into. We are one of the parties to this treaty. Great Britain is the other. Great Britain has asked for arbitration of the questions involved. We have refused. Great Britain has the same right in the absence of arbitration to insist upon its construction of this treaty as we have, and our honor demands that we either submit the matter to an impartial tribunal or else recede from the position which we took when the Panama Canal act was passed. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we have heard much during this debate about the honor of our flag, and there has been much twisting of the tail of the British lion. But I say to you that it requires more courage, it requires more patriotism, to stand upon this floor and insist that this great Nation of ours shall live up to its contract, shall abide by its treaty, even though it be to its disadvantage to do so, than to get up and make appeals to passion and prejudice, as appeals have been made through a large part of this debate. [Applause.]

Members can justify a vote against this bill only when convinced that this exemption is economically sound and that it is not in violation of the treaty. To defeat this bill because of any supposed partisan advantage, or because of resentment toward Great Britain under the claim that she is interfering with our internal affairs, is not upholding our national honor, but trailing it in the dust. I will not be a party to it. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. I yield back, Mr. Speaker, the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin yields back two minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] is recognized.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the action of Congress on this measure will largely affect our national character. We are to decide whether we will construe an international treaty selfishly or unselfishly; whether we will seek the friendship or arouse the enmity of nations; whether we will sacrifice world commerce for the sake of asserting a doubtful national right. Nations are like individuals; their relations with each other are determined by the same forces which affect the social intercourse of men. We either trust or distrust our neighbor as we are familiar with his character. If he stands foursquare to all tests of fidelity, we give him our confidence, accept his word without question, and enter implicitly with him into every business and social engagement. On the other hand, if we find him unmindful of his obligations, we withhold our confidence and look upon him with suspicion. The world has witnessed countless wrecks of human character, of those who sacrificed the opportunity to gain the confidence and the good will of their fellow men through surrender to selfish and questionable ambitions. Nations are but men in the mass, and there is a true national character as well as an individual character. Character is revealed through its manifestations. We do not know men until we are brought into contact with them and observe the decisions they make where material and moral issues are involved. National character is determined in the same manner. As nation touches nation in commerce and intercourse, impressions of its character are formed. Deprived of this privilege of association and fellowship, the power to grow is weakened and national dissolution is threatened. Our sister Republic to the south is a vivid and striking illustration of this lamentable condition. Without apparent national self-respect, unmindful of her reputation in the family of nations, and unable as yet to summon into action a resident power that will make for good order and stability, she hastens forward to a fate which we can not now foresee, but which is as certain in its consequences as that night follows day. Her only hope of recovery is to obtain that recognition and counsel from sister nations which can only be given when she has demonstrated her right to receive it.

Why are we confronted with the necessity for this legislation? The President has told us that the passage of this bill is required to correct an economic mistake, and also to give him the support he desires to carry out the foreign policy of his administration.

Members upon this floor have practically charged the President with duplicity and cowardice. The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] gleefully and sardonically alludes to the fact that the President received a representative of Great Britain upon two different Sundays and also upon a holiday, thereby creating in his mind the impression, which he is seeking to convey to the public, that the President has entered into some kind of conspiracy to sacrifice the interests of his country which could only be consummated by appropriating time not ordinarily devoted to public business. Suspicion would not have been aroused in the mind of the gentleman from California if the President had canceled his numerous and pressing engagements upon one or more week days in order to give audience to a representative of a great sovereign power. We know, however, that the gentleman was not obliged to look through the keyhole in the door to the President's office to learn who was with him, as during this administration that door has been open and visitors who are entitled by the nature of their business to see the President are admitted. Their names are not concealed. I do not wish in any way to question the sleuthing ability of the gentleman, but his reputation along this line would be greatly enhanced if he could discover the time when and the place where the matter of presenting the owners of the coastwise shipping monoply with the free use of the Panama Canal was proposed and agreed to. I am sure the country would welcome such information and it would prove of great value in influencing public opinion upon this important legislation.

Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] rushes vociferously into the arena of debate and declares that he believes the judgment of the President with respect to this legislation has been determined by his lack of physical courage. Notwithstanding the fact that he has examined the career of the President with great detail, he finds an absence of those fighting qualities which were so highly developed in the person of Andrew Jackson. The gentleman, however, has failed to recognize the fact that though the absence of war deprived the President of the opportunity to display his physical courage, yet he has not failed to demonstrate to the country on more than one occasion that he possesses moral courage to give him equal rank with Andrew Jackson or any other occupant of the presidential chair. He has met fearlessly the attacks of privileged monopoly and the assaults of corrupt political influence, and has overcome them all through this force of moral courage.

The interests of our country can be more safely intrusted to the protecting and patriotic guidance of Woodrow Wilson than in the hands of one who magnifies military and naval forces as the controlling agencies in the settlement of international disputes. The gentleman from force of habit rings the changes on the violation of platform pledges. If a political party through its Executive and its Representatives in Congress must sacrifice the welfare and honor of the Nation in order to maintain the integrity of a platform declaration which was not made with the full knowledge of international controversies and difficulties that would arise from the enforcement of the policy therein enunciated, the people would be justified in condemning it as unworthy to administer the affairs of government and not deserving of public confidence.

The President and Democrats who support this legislation are charged with treachery to platform obligations. We are told that the American people passed upon this question in the election of 1912. The Democratic Party has always been the foe of Government subsidies in every form. Recognizing the weakness of our merchant marine, the party has never committed itself to any form of ship subsidy as the proper means for its development. The national platform of 1880 contained the following plank:

Free ships and a living chance for American commerce on the seas and on the land. No discrimination in favor of transportation lines, corporations, or monopolies.

The same policy was indorsed in the platform of 1904 in the following language:

We denounce the ship-subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

A further indorsement of this policy was made in the platform of 1908, as follows:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

The platform declarations above given clearly set forth the time-honored policy of the party with reference to our merchant marine. It has always opposed the taking of money raised by taxation and bestowing it upon private and special interests, and the plank in the Democratic platform of 1912 which declares for toll exemption for American coastwise shipping is clearly at variance with Democratic faith and tradition. In order to make it of binding force one must disregard the declarations in previous platforms and must even dismiss the consideration of the plank in the platform of 1912, which is in direct conflict with the toll-exemption plank. In order that we may look at these two conflicting provisions and weigh the one against the other, I desire to place them in parallel columns:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the South, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.	We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

Who will contend that the exemption of tolls does not constitute a subsidy from the Public Treasury and is, therefore, abhorrent to every tenet and principle of Democratic faith?

Viewing all of these declarations in their proper light and recognizing the consistent and unmistakable attitude of the party upon the question, I do not see how any Democrat can be bound by the clause favoring exemption in the platform of 1912 and refuse to observe the binding force of the opposing declaration in the same platform, and also disregard the declarations made by previous national conventions.

But this charge of platform violation can not alone be laid at the door of the Democratic Party. Before the gentleman from New York began to seek the mote of Democratic infidelity he should have first cast out the beam of inconsistency from the declarations of many of his party's leaders on this question. Let me read an editorial utterance from the Rocky Mountain News of March 14 last, a newspaper of the gentleman's own political faith:

When you think you hear strange echoes breaking out of Washington these beautiful March mornings, don't mistake them for the real thing. They're not. They're only the rumblings of the Shipping Trust bellowing for free passage for its vessels through the Panama Canal. The trust is making a tremendous bluff to try and make Congress believe that it represents the great American people. It doesn't. It represents itself, and no other party in interest.

The Shipping Trust would have us believe that if it is made to pay tolls like the rest of the world to help defray the expense of maintaining the canal all the coastwise vessels now plying along the Atlantic seaboard will have to strike their flags and go into dry dock for all time. There is not the slightest danger of that. The only danger at all in the controversy is that the trust will have to pay its dues to the United States. As things look now, it is a moral certainty that this must be done.

Outside of that the canal is all right, and the tolls are all right. They may not seem right to the Shipping Trust, but there are about 80,000,000 of citizens who will positively refuse to drop a tear if the trust has to pay its share of the cost of upkeeping the canal. Because that is precisely what it is bound to do if it doesn't want to be transferred into the something-for-nothing class, of which we have a large and growing constituency among monopolies, or did have until one Woodrow Wilson announced that he would take a hand in the game. They're not so numerous now.

And I also present an editorial from the same paper under date of March 16 last:

WHERE THE SHOE PINCHES.

Proponents of free canal tolls for American coastwise vessels insist that a political platform promise is paramount to a guaranty of treaty rights. Strangely enough, too, the most ardent of these advocates can be found among the most strenuous of the political opportunists, the chaps who always have an ax ready for the grindstone. They profess horror that the President should place honor over political exigency. They are shocked, or pretend to be, that the glittering shibboleth of a political convention should not have greater measure of importance than treaty provisions agreed to and sanctioned under the solemn seal of national and international honor.

All President Wilson asks is that the United States shall keep its word. It is not a question of England or Germany or Russia, but of all nations whose ships may use the canal. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that all vessels going through the canal shall be treated alike. This applies to American as well as to foreign ships. In spite of this, however, the coastwise Shipping Trust—tremendously solicitous, of course, for the integrity of the Baltimore platform—demands that it be subsidized to the extent of $1,000,000 a year, knowing well that the other ships must be penalized to make up that nifty little graft in their interest. But then, you see, the trust, protesting vehemently the observance of the Baltimore platform in one breath, disregards Jeffersonian doctrine in another, flouts national honor in the next—for a million dollars a year. Patriotism comes mighty high betimes when shipping trusts get busy.

The opposition of the Democratic Party to all subsidies is historic. Why it should change now, in the zenith of its success, is a problem no one but the Shipping Trust, toting around a political platform as its excuse, seems to be able to answer satisfactorily. The trust would reverse party tradition and strangle party precedent if only it can stick that $1,000,000 a year into its plethoric treasury. It has thrown down the gage of battle to the President. The bankers did that to Jackson. History tells us what Jackson did to the bankers. History will also tell what Woodrow Wilson did to the Shipping Trust and its demanded subsidy in 1914.

This paper to-day is conducting a strenuous campaign to secure freight-rate reductions to the Rocky Mountain territory. Certainly it would not be supporting the President in his attitude if it thought for a minute that the repeal of the exemption clause would prevent a lowering of transcontinental rates.

The following editorial is taken from the Colorado Springs Gazette under date of March 19. This paper is owned by Hon. C. P. Dodge, who is the present chairman of the Progressive State central committee of Colorado and one of the most active and influential members of the party in the West:

CANAL TOLLS AND THE SHIPPING TRUST.

Not a little of the popular misunderstanding of the canal tolls question has arisen from a failure to consider just who would be benefited by exemption. The plea that exemption would encourage American shipping and especially that it would enable coastwise ships to compete with the transcontinental railroads sounds plausible. But the fact is that all of the coastwise shipping interests are in a combine, or trust, constituting a private interest of immense magnitude. Exemption from the payment of tolls at Panama would mean to them a saving estimated at about $1,000,000 a year. The revenues of the Government from the canal would be reduced by just that much, which means that the money for interest on the bonds would have to be raised by taxation—in other words, come out of the pockets of the people.

Thus the effect of exemption would virtually be the presentation of a million dollars or more a year from the Treasury to the Shipping Trust. If anybody demanded that such favoritism be shown to the Steel Trust or the Oil Trust or any other special interest, it would be immediately hooted. But there is a hazy idea in many minds that the term "American shipping" as here applied referred to something very near and dear to the people themselves, perhaps even that the vessels of the Navy would be required to pay tolls.

The more thorough the discussion of this question the plainer it becomes that the effort to exempt American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is merely a sordid attempt to benefit private interests at public expense. It is bad enough in this aspect, but since it also involves repudiation of an international treaty and therefore the sacrifice of national honor, it is infinitely worse. Fortunately, though, there is no indication that it will succeed.

What is the economic mistake referred to in the President's message? It is that provision of the act of August 24, 1912, exempting vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. The advocates of this provision contend that it is necessary to insure a lowering of transcontinental transportation rates either by rail or sea. I question the correctness of this assertion. Must it be confessed that the American people have no other remedy at hand to regulate and control these rates except by taxing themselves to build and operate a canal at the cost of $375,000,000, with all the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States? Must it be confessed that every legislative and constitutional agency has been exhausted to control transportation to no avail and that the integrity of the Nation must be sacrificed in order to gain a useless and ineffective financial advantage? An examination of the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Spokane and Nevada Railroad rate cases demonstrates conclusively that the railroads have dominated and controlled water transportation as well as that by rail. The commission states, in its decision in the Spokane case, that—

In this connection it should be observed that in the past water competition has been by various devices upon the part of rail carriers restrained and subdued.

At the outset the special contract system was devised, under which large rebates from the going rate were paid to those shippers who exclusively patronized the rail lines. By this scheme the ships were soon robbed of the bulk of their traffic.

When this expedient would no longer be tolerated transcontinental railroads subsidized the Panama line, which had become the active water competitor, by purchasing a considerable part of the total available space in the boats of that line from New York, and thus controlling the rates by that route. This was continued for years.

Since the advent of the American-Hawaiian Line there has been, not perhaps a definite agreement between it and the rail lines, but a general understanding that such rates should be maintained by water as compared with rates by rail as would give to the vessels a reasonable amount of traffic from the immediate vicinity of New York.

Those who oppose the bill will contend that these conditions will be removed by the provision of the act of 1912 which forbids free tolls to railroad and trust owned vessels. Will anyone contend that owners of independent vessels will not be obliged to look largely to those great commercial and manufacturing interests that are in some measure dependent upon railroad favors for their business? Will they not learn very soon that their interests and those of the railroad companies are in some sense mutual? And may we not expect a continuance of working agreements referred to in the decision quoted? The influence of the intrenched investment of the nineteen billions of railroad capital in this country, together with the billions of capital engaged in other enterprises which are affected to a large degree by railroad development, will be exerted to prevent, and successfully, I believe, any formidable competition by ocean or waterway that will reduce either the income or the earnings of railroad property. These great transportation agencies must be regulated and controlled through governmental authority.

Another surprising fact revealed by the commission is this, that the shippers of the Pacific coast do not desire low rates. Let me quote the commission in the Spokane case:

Of more importance than all the rest have been the extremely harmonious relations generally existing between shippers and rail carriers upon the Pacific coast. Those shippers most interested in transcontinental rates have been the jobbers of San Francisco and other coast-terminal cities. The only desire of those shippers has been that rates should be so adapted as would enable them to transact business against interior cities. So long as this relation of rates has existed the jobber has been willing to pay both a high rate to San Francisco and a high rate from San Francisco. In consideration that this relation should be maintained the shipper upon the coast has found it for his interest to patronize largely the rail carrier without inquiring too closely what rates were available by water.

In other words, the jobbers in the coast cities have said to the railroads, "If you will give us rates to interior cities that will allow us to control their trade, you may have our business, even if we can secure lower rates by water for our transcontinental shipments." While it is true that water competition does now exist and does now affect rates from the eastern seaboard to the Pacific coast, yet this competition is confined to a comparatively limited region and has no effect upon rates from the great manufacturing centers in the interior. I must believe from the facts above named that the exemption clause in the Panama act would not produce any appreciable reduction in transportation rates, but would be a source of income and profit to special interests at the expense of the American people.

Our experience with the great abuses that grew up under the rebate system of the railroad companies is too recent for us to forget the effect of that system upon the consuming public. When a shipper received a rebate, did he share the rebate with his customer? He merely reduced the price of his article just low enough to undersell his competitor who had not received the privilege, and then he added the balance of the sum received in rebate to his profit. Such will be the case under the subsidy permitted by the act of 1912. The steamship companies will merely reduce their rates to as small an amount as possible under the rail rates in order to secure business and will pocket as much of the subsidy as they can secure. Gentlemen may indulge in all the tricks of oratory to conceal the fact that this exemption privilege is a subsidy, but I wish to call their attention to a statement made by President Taft when he signed the bill. He said:

The policy of exempting the coastwise trade from all tolls really involves the question of granting a Government subsidy for the purpose of encouraging that trade in competition with the trade of the transcontinental railroads. I approve this policy. It is in accord with the historical course of the Government in giving Government aid to to the construction of the transcontinental roads. It is now merely giving Government aid to a means of transportation that competes with those transcontinental roads.

After reading this statement, who will contend for a minute that we are not voting for a subsidy, which is abhorrent to every tenet of Democratic profession if we retain the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act?

In support of my contention that water transportation has made little, if any, impression upon transcontinental rates, I wish to direct attention to the fact that there has been a decline in value of the stock of railroads engaged in transcontinental traffic during the past year. Surely, if the advocates of the exemption clause are correct in their assumption that it is necessary to lower transportation rates, the value of railroad stocks would have been more or less affected when it became known that the President intended to advocate the repeal of the exemption privilege and that Congress would probably indorse his position. As a matter of fact these stocks are lower now than they were a year ago, when this action was not foreseen. I give herewith a table showing the highest value of the stocks during the year 1913 and the quotations for the week closing March 21, 1914. In every instance it will be seen that the stocks are lower and reflect in no sense any advance in value on account of the proposed withdrawal of the exemption privilege:

Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co	106⅜	98
Denver & Rio Grande	23½	12
Chicago & North Western	138	134½
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul	116½	99½
Great Northern	132⅜	128⅜
Missouri Pacific	43⅜	25
Southern Pacific	110	95
Union Pacific	162½	158½

There is another feature of the exemption clause which, to my mind, opens it to serious objection, and that is the opportunity it offers for violation of treaty obligations in a way which is not prohibited and which I believe can not be prevented. I see nothing in the act to prevent an exporter in New York from sending his goods to himself or to another party in San Francisco without any charge for tolls, and then reship the same cargo at San Francisco to a foreign port. There certainly will be a discrimination against the foreign exporter if this can be done, and we will not only lose the revenue to be derived on the imposition of tolls on American vessels, but we will also find that the revenue received from foreign ships and from our ships engaged in foreign trade will be greatly reduced by the operation of this practice. It is easy to understand why other nations have objected to the exemption clause when we realize the possibilities which exist for its abuse and evasion.

But there is a much larger question involved in this legislation than the correction of an economic blunder. It is that of maintaining our national obligations. The history of diplomatic negotiations in connection with the Isthmian Canal clearly sets forth the position taken by our Nation with reference to its neutrality and administration. In order that we may fully understand the attitude of Great Britain with reference to the matter under discussion, it will be well for us to briefly review the conditions that existed in Central America prior to the negotiation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, signed April 19, 1850. Ever since 1786 Great Britain had exercised partial, if not complete, sovereignty over a large portion of Central America. She had secured harbors on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and was in a position to acquire valuable rights in order to supervise and control an interoceanic canal. This statement is supported by the message which was sent to Congress by President Zachary Taylor, April 22, 1850, in which he used the following language:

At the time negotiations were opened with Nicaragua for the construction of a canal through her territory I found Great Britain in possession of nearly half of Central America, as the ally and protector of the Mosquito King. It has been my object in negotiating this treaty not only to secure the passage across the Isthmus to the Government and citizens of the United States by the construction of a great highway dedicated to the use of all nations on equal terms, but to maintain the independence and sovereignty of all the Central American Republics. The Senate will judge how far these objects have been effected.

The principles by which I have been regulated in the negotiation of this treaty are in accordance with the sentiments well expressed by my immediate predecessor on the 10th of February, 1847, when he communicated to the Senate the treaty with New Granada for the protection of the railroad at Panama. It is in accordance with the whole spirit of the resolution of the Senate of the 3d of March, 1835, referred to by President Polk, and with the policy adopted by President Jackson immediately after the passage of that resolution, who dispatched an agent to Central America and New Granada "to open negotiations with those Governments for the purpose of effectually protecting by suitable treaty stipulations with them such individuals or companies as might undertake to open a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as might be established to compensate the capitalists who should engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

Let me read article 5 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in order that we may clearly understand the treaty obligations respecting the canal that were in force prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

ARTICLE 5.

The contracting parties further engaged, that when the said canal shall have been completed, they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

One of the considerations which was involved in the consummation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was the practical recognition of the Monroe doctrine by Great Britain, in which she relinquished her right to exercise any domination over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, or the Mosquito coasts or any part of Central America. Will any reasonable person contend that the consideration involved in this treaty on the part of Great Britain did not justify the United States in granting the absolute freedom of commerce through the Isthmian Canal when the same was constructed? We must interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the light of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and when these treaties are compared we readily understand why Great Britain should object to the exemption clause in the Panama act of 1912.

It is not necessary for me to review at length the statements made by the succeeding Presidents who have made declarations upon the subject. Presidents Buchanan and Cleveland both declared that the construction of the canal was a great world enterprise and was designed to contribute to the commerce of the entire world. President Cleveland in his message of December 8, 1885, said:

Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit, a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition. An engagement combining the construction, ownership, and operation of such a work by this Government, with an offensive and defensive alliance for its protection, with the foreign state whose responsibilities and rights we would share is, in my judgment, inconsistent with such dedication to universal and neutral use, and would, moreover, entail measures for its realization beyond the scope of our national polity or present means.

The lapse of years has abundantly confirmed the wisdom and foresight of those earlier administrations which, long before the conditions of maritime intercourse were changed and enlarged by the progress of the age, proclaimed the vital need of interoceanic transit across the American Isthmus and consecrated it in advance to the common use of mankind by their positive declarations and through the formal obligation of treaties. Toward such realization the efforts of my administration will be applied, ever bearing in mind the principles on which it must rest, and which were declared in no uncertain tones by Mr. Cass who, while Secretary of State in 1858, announced that, "What the United States want in Central America, next to the happiness of its people, is the security and neutrality of the interoceanic routes which lead through it."

The construction of three transcontinental lines of railway, all in successful operation, wholly within our territory and uniting the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, has been accompanied by results of a most interesting and impressive nature, and has created new conditions, not in the routes of commerce only, but in political geography, which powerfully affect our relations toward, and necessarily increase our interests in, any trans-Isthmian route which may be opened and employed for the ends of peace and traffic, or, in other contingencies, for uses inimical to both.

Transportation is a factor in the cost of commodities scarcely second to that of their production, and weighs as heavily upon the consumer. Our experience already has proven the great importance of having the competition between land carriage and water carriage fully developed, each acting as a protection to the public against the tendencies to monopoly which are inherent in the consolidation of wealth and power in the hands of vast corporations.

These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

I challenge the opponents of this bill to show a single expression in any of these messages that our Government made any reservation for any particular use of the canal for our shipping, either coastwise or foreign. From President Taylor to President Taft, all declared that the canal should be open and free to the world, without discrimination or special privilege. But we are not compelled to rely upon the above statements for our belief in the construction placed upon this matter by President Wilson, as we have before us the clear and explicit statement of President Roosevelt, made on December 7, 1903, with reference to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

For 400 years, ever since shortly after the discovery of this hemisphere, the canal across the Isthmus has been planned. For two-score years it has been worked at. When made it is to last for the ages. It is to alter the geography of a continent and the trade routes of the world. We have shown by every treaty we have negotiated or attempted to negotiate with the peoples in control of the Isthmus and with foreign nations in reference thereto our consistent good faith in observing our obligations, on the one hand to the peoples of the Isthmus and on the other hand to the civilized world whose commercial rights we are safeguarding and guaranteeing by our action.

Could language be any plainer than his, and is it not a daring violation of all knowledge of English speech to read into the phrases uttered by President Roosevelt anything that reserves for our own Nation rights and privileges not enjoyed by our foreign competitors? I would much rather form my judgment upon this legislation upon the clear and unmistakable declarations of Mr. Roosevelt than I would to take the forced construction of those who hope to profit by the exemption privilege.

I like to read the words uttered by the late lamented Secretary of State, John Hay, in his address on "American diplomacy," delivered November 19, 1901, one day after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been signed. He declared:

It may be another instance of that "naif" credulity with which I have often been charged by European critics when I say that I really believe the world has moved onward in diplomacy as in many other matters. In my experience of diplomatic life, which now covers more years than I like to look back upon, and in the far greater record of American diplomacy which I have read and studied, I can say without hesitation that we have generally told squarely what we wanted, announced early in negotiation what we were willing to give, and allowed the other side to accept or reject our terms.

Who will believe for a minute that Mr. Hay, whose record in statesmanship is one of which all Americans are proud, should have formulated a treaty of peace between two of the greatest nations of the world, both speaking the same language, that would be open to doubtful interpretation?

In this connection I desire to quote from a statement made by Hon. Joseph H. Choate, who was ambassador to England at the time of the ratification of the treaty:

I venture to say now that in the whole course of the negotiation of this particular treaty no claim, no suggestion, was made that there should be any exemption of anybody. How could there be in face of the words they agreed upon? Lord Pauncefote and John Hay were singularly honest and truthful men. They knew the meaning of the English language, and when they agreed upon the language of the treaty they carried out the fundamental principle of their whole diplomacy, so far as I know anything about it, and in the six years I was engaged with them their cardinal rule was to mean what they said and to say what they meant. * * *

From the time that this question of a canal through the Isthmus or a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, whether through the Isthmus or by way of Nicaragua or Tehuantepec or anywhere else, was agitated, the universal declarations of public men, of Presidents and Secretaries of State, and other public men on both sides of the Atlantic were to the effect that the canal, if it ever should be built, should be built for the benefit of mankind, on principles of universal equality of the vessels of all nations, and without any discrimination in favor of any.

I prefer to take my stand with these men rather than to ally myself with those who are endeavoring to sacrifice our national honor for private gain and advantage. This is not a partisan question, and those who seek to derive partisan benefit from it will find themselves to be very much in error if they expect popular indorsement of their course. Those who are supporting the President in this matter find themselves backed up by a public sentiment which is not confined to any one section of the country, but is national and general. Leading men of all political parties have indorsed the President's position on this great question.

After all, this is a question of common honesty in our international relations. I can not accept the construction of Americanism as given by those who are trying to arouse national antagonism throughout the country. There is an Americanism that looks purely to the pocketbook and can not measure patriotism except in dollars and cents. It would prostitute every government function to the mere service it can render along material and commercial lines. We can not accept the conclusion that national values are to be determined by financial considerations. There are those who believe that Americanism should be worked out in larger terms. What shall it profit a nation to lose its character and reputation for a mere mess of financial pottage? There is such a losing of national self and such a giving out of national influence as shall bring a nation thus controlled a larger return in material and moral values which can not be conceived. The preservation of national honor and of national character is involved in this measure. The President has summoned us to a high performance of national duty. What shall be our answer to his call? [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY]. [Applause].

THE SO-CALLED GAG RULE.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Speaker, this question has been fully argued, and opponents of the repeal, who of course voted against the rule, admit, and without exception so far as I can ascertain, that every argument for and against the bill had been fully stated in speeches consuming not more than five hours. Considering, therefore, that the rule provided for 20 hours' debate on the bill and that by agreement 3 hours' debate on the rule itself was permitted, and also that part of those 3 hours was consumed in debate on the merits of the main question, it is obvious, and it will be admitted—in fact, is admitted—by fair-minded men that ample time for debate was given.

It was first arranged that there should be 10 hours' general debate, and this was entirely satisfactory to the leader of the opposition to the bill; but others suggested 15 hours and that was agreed to, and it was then claimed that 20 hours should be allowed, and that was agreed to as apparently satisfactory to all sides.

When the clause exempting coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls was under consideration on the passage of the Panama act in 1912 the question was debated for only four hours.

There can be, therefore, no fair contention that the right to debate has now been unduly limited, especially as the rule gave every Member of the House the right to have his views printed in the RECORD, so that his constituents might know them.

THE RIGHT TO OFFER AMENDMENTS.

The rule permits the offering of one amendment, though it is sought to create the impression that none can be offered. It is sought also to create the impression that this is the first time that the Democratic House of Representatives has adopted such a rule. This is not the fact, for the Sixty-second Congress adopted its rules in just that way.

Wishing, however, to vote so as not to preclude the offering of substantial amendments offered in good faith, I endeavored to ascertain the situation in that respect and found that only one amendment was suggested; or, in other words, that one of three courses of action was to be followed, namely, to defeat the bill, to pass it, or to amend it so as to suspend the exemption clause of the Panama act pending arbitration.

Finding, therefore, that the rule preserved all substantial rights, I voted for it.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

I regret that my vote is not in conformity with my party's platform, but am convinced that it responds to a higher obligation.

I regret also that during the campaign of 1912 I did not realize the possibility that this question would again come before the Congress, for I certainly would have then openly taken the stand which I now take, just as I did announce my opposition to the expenditure of money from the Federal Treasury for the construction of roads—a stand which I believe was approved by my constituents.

If the Baltimore platform had read that "Notwithstanding our belief that the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is a violation of a promise contained in a solemn treaty, nevertheless we favor such exemption," I can not imagine that the Democratic Party would have received any support because of such a declaration, nor am I willing to believe that my constituents now would approve my action should I base it on the party platform, knowing, as they do, that thereby I should deliberately cast aside a conviction which I voiced when I voted against the exemption in 1912 and which I conscientiously hold, to follow a course of which my judgment would not approve were a question of expediency only involved.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, between the United States and Great Britain was a convention—

* * * setting forth and fixing * * * their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty contained provision for joint protection and other provisions which the United States came to consider as unfavorable from our point of view, and therefore sought modification of its provisions.

Secretary of State Olney, in the year 1896, in an official memorandum on this subject, which is a part of the preliminary negotiations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, says:

Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relation to each other, either of nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty is in full force and effect. If changed conditions make stipulations which were once deemed advantageous either inapplicable or injurious, the true remedy is not in ingenious attempts to deny the existence of the treaty nor to explain away its provisions, but in a direct and straightforward application to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter.

Our request, therefore, to be achieved of some of the obligations of that treaty finally resulted in the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

SOME RIGHTS OF BOTH PARTIES UNDER THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Secretary of State Cass in 1857, commenting upon the canal to be constructed under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, assured the British minister of foreign affairs:

The United States, as I have before had occasion to assure your lordship, demand no exclusive privileges in this passage, but will always exert their influence to secure their free and unrestricted benefits, both in peace and war, to the commerce of the world.

What those privileges were, so far as the present question is concerned, will be seen from the following clause of article 1—

* * * nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

And from the following clause of article 6:

* * * and the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

And from article 8, which is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are not proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

SECRETARY BLAINE'S VIEWS WHEN BLOOD WAS COOL AND PASSIONS NOT AROUSED.

Secretary of State Blaine, in instructions to Mr. Lowell, our ambassador to Great Britain, looking to proposals to Great Britain for modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, says:

The United States recognizes a proper guarantee of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama, and in the last generation every step was taken by this Government that it deemed requisite in the premises. * * * Nor in time of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway, under the exclusive control of an American corporation. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment.

The contention of the opponents of this bill is just what Secretary Blaine said that we did not claim, namely, on "exclusive privileges * * * to American ships in respect to * * * tolls." Does the Hay-Pauncefote treaty give us such a privilege? My answer is emphatically "no."

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The preamble of that treaty reads:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

Note that the words "general principle" are quoted, and from article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but that the word "neutralization" does not appear in that article; so the word "neutralization" as used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is to be defined by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and by each and every part thereof. But even had the quotation of the words not made the intention and meaning obvious, still ordinary rules of interpretation would have done so, for John Bassett Moore says, speaking of the word "neutral" and of its old meaning:

> The term has in recent times received a larger application. A condition of neutrality, or one resembling it, has been created, as it were, artificially, and the process has been called "neutralization."

He says elsewhere:

> Equality of tolls has also been treated as a feature, or perhaps rather as a condition, of neutrality.

By the terms of article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is superseded, but, of course, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8.

Now, although by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Great Britain was relieved from the burden of jointly protecting the canal, this also was done "without impairing the 'general principle'" contained in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, namely, that "any canal built across the Isthmus should be 'open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms.'"

I am satisfied that if no other mention of equal terms were made in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty than the one just referred to, the exemption of our coastwise traffic would be a violation of the treaty; but article 3 of that treaty reads:

> The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:
> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

And other sections follow.

This is so clear and so conclusive that only by interpolation of the word "other," so that "all nations" shall be made to read "all other nations," can the advocates of exemption even attempt to construe it favorably to their contention. Granting them that interpretation for the sake of argument, then, after the word "discrimination" we must insert "by the United States," for other nations, not having control, can not discriminate against each other, so what is forbidden is not only discrimination between other nations, even though it might not favor the United States, and which would nevertheless be discrimination "against any nation," but also discrimination by the United States in its own favor, which likewise would be "against any nation" such as is in fact now created by us "against" all nations by the Panama act.

It is the sheerest subterfuge to say that because foreign vessels can not engage in our coastwise traffic citizens owning them are not discriminated against by the Panama act. A vessel sailing from Canada for San Francisco competes with one sailing from Boston to San Francisco, and if they carry similar cargoes the citizen of Canada shipping the goods is discriminated against in favor of the citizen of Boston shipping his goods.

So would there be discrimination against citizens of Germany or France shipping goods through the canal to San Francisco in competition with similar goods shipped from New York to San Francisco.

CANADIAN CANALS.

The treaty of 1871 with Great Britain provided for the use by citizens of the United States of Canadian canals "on terms of entire equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

Canada made certain regulations which it claimed applied equally to all vessels but which were so ingeniously framed as to discriminate against us in favor of Canadian vessels. Our contention was set forth by one of our Presidents as follows:

> The treaty runs to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with inhabitants of the Dominion. It was intended to give to consumers of the United States, to our own people engaged in railroad transportation, and to those exporting from our ports equal terms in passing their merchandise through these canals.

The discrimination was not stopped until, under a law now in full force, President Harrison issued a proclamation of retaliation.

The history of this controversy with Canada proves conclusively that our coastwise traffic can not have preferential treatment.

THE CANAL MIGHT HAVE BEEN BUILT PRIVATELY.

Article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides:

> It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

It has not been contended by opponents of repeal that if the canal had not been built by the United States, but by a private corporation, coastwise vessels could have been exempted by Congress from the payment of tolls, and as the provisions of the treaty do not differentiate expressly in favor of the method first mentioned, namely, construction at Government expense, no implied differentiation can be permitted.

OLSEN AGAINST SMITH.

It is claimed that because the Supreme Court in the case of Olsen against Smith held that an exemption of coastwise vessels from pilotage charges in American ports was not a violation of the treaty of 1815; therefore the exemption in the Panama act is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The majority report on the present bill completely answers that contention, and I quote from it:

> The treaty of 1815 proposes expressly "to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective countries, territories, and people" (Great Britain and the United States), and in three articles covers all the commercial relations between these countries, their territories, and people.
> The first and second articles relate to freedom of commerce and navigation in reciprocal trade between all the territories of the United States and all the territories of Great Britain in Europe only, admitting "their ships and cargoes to all such places, ports, and rivers in the territories aforesaid" with "complete protection and security," but "subject always to the laws and the statutes of the two countries, respectively."
> So that not only is the entire idea of coastwise trade excluded from consideration by physical and geographical conditions, but in the last paragraph of the second article it is provided that the commerce of the continent of North America and the West Indies "shall not be affected by any provision of this article, but each party shall remain in complete possession of its rights with respect to such intercourse."
> In the third article, in which certain rights are granted to foreign ships to touch at certain points in a country, express agreement is made that the arrangement will not extend to the coasting trade.
> So, in view of the terms of the treaty expressly excluding local commerce of the continent of America and the West Indies from consideration and also making all the foreign commerce subject to the laws of the country, there is no wonder that the Supreme Court held the statute in question not to be a violation of the treaty. There is no analogy or resemblance between the two cases. In that case alleged discrimination was a pilotage regulation in an American port, not prohibited by treaty at all, but expressly provided in the treaty to be governed by the local law unaffected by the treaty.

THE EXECUTIVE-SESSION GRAVEYARD.

The opponents of repeal, so desperate is their case, are obliged to visit the graveyard of executive sessions of the treaty-making branch of the Congress, and there finding a stone covered with the moss of many years and inscribed—

> Sacred to the memory of a stillborn attempt to tax the many for the benefit of the few—they rifle the grave and attempt to give life to the skeleton by the breath of present recollection. The bones rattle and they mistake the rattling for signs of life. The skeleton is accounted for as follows:

> On the question to agree to the amendment, proposed by Mr. Bard, to wit, strike out article 3 and substitute the following:
> "ARTICLE 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."
> It was determined in the negative—yeas, 27; nays, 43.

It is claimed now that this proposed amendment was defeated because, without it, coastwise vessels were exempted by implication, and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is quoted as stating that such is his recollection. But on Saturday last his distinguished son-in-law, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], showed how familiar and variable recollection may be, and I quote from the RECORD, at page 5714:

> Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], in which he quoted Senator LODGE on the 20th of July, 1912, saying that he voted against the Bard amendment because he thought that the right to fix tolls was already in the treaty, I wish to put into the RECORD the Senate debate of July 17, 1912, three days earlier. It shows that Senator LODGE had at the time forgotten the discussion over the Bard amendment. Much as I admire the Senator, I can not believe that his memory of what happened a dozen years before was any better evidence on July 20, 1912, than on July 17, 1912. The debate of July 17, to which I refer, was as follows:
> "Mr. LODGE. When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase 'all nations.' But I see very plainly, Mr. President——

"Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me before he passes from that point?

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CUMMINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

"Mr. LODGE. I do.

"Mr. BACON. I happened to be here at that time myself and also to be on the Foreign Relations Committee with the Senator. I want to ask the Senator if he can recall that either in the committee or in the Senate there was at any time an assertion of the opinion of Senators that that was the construction of the treaty? Does the Senator recall that that ever was asserted?

"Mr. LODGE. You mean that we should have the right to determine the tolls?

"Mr. BACON. Yes.

"Mr. LODGE. I do not recall now that the question was ever raised.

"Mr. BACON. I do not think it was.

"Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 16, if the Senator will allow me, of pamphlet 85——

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the junior Senator from Georgia?

"Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia. What pamphlet is it?

"Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is Document No. 85 of the Fifty-seventh Congress. This was a motion offered apparently in the Senate in connection with the treaty of December 13, 1900, which, after being amended by the Senate, I understand was not approved by Great Britain. On page 16 it seems that this amendment was offered:

"'The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.'

"I find that the Senate even rejected this, voting yeas 27, nays 43. I wanted to ask the Senator——

"Mr. LODGE. That refers to the first treaty.

"Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

"Mr. BACON. That I had in mind, of course. If I recollect aright, it was Senator Bard's amendment. I will not stop to explain it now, but my vote in favor of it was not on the ground that I favored free ships. But in view of the Senator's statement that he reported the bill, which was a fact, and indicating his familiarity with it, I wanted to ask him what his then construction of it was, whether he could recall that in the process of the making of that treaty, either while it was in committee or in the Senate, it was ever asserted by anyone as the proper construction of that treaty.

"Mr. LODGE. I do not remember that any construction either one way or the other was asserted.

"Mr. BACON. I do not, either. I quite agree with the Senator in that regard, and it was for that reason that I asked the question.

"Mr. LODGE. I mentioned merely my own impression, which was that it left the fixing of tolls to us, but it is very clear to anyone on the simple reading of the clause that the interpretation is open to doubt. I think on the face of the words either view can fairly be taken. Such being the case, Mr. President, I do not wish anything done by which this Government could ever be exposed to the suggestion even of not acting in good faith under a treaty. I think we should be most punctilious, even if there is nothing more than a doubt about a word, in carrying out the treaty strictly to its letter.

"It is, of course, also true, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pointed out, that if we should undertake simply to make our ships free, we should raise a question which would then, under our treaties of arbitration, necessarily go to The Hague."

COASTWISE PREFERENCE.

In 1884 we entered into the Frelinghuysen-Zalaya treaty, which contained a clause providing for—equal tolls for the vessels of all nations.

But another clause read:

Excepting the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade—proving conclusively that the general clause includes coastwise traffic and that our treaty-making power knows how to exclude it when that is the intention.

THE PANAMA TREATY.

It is claimed that our acquisition of rights in the Canal Zone has so changed the situation as to nullify the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but that contention is answered by article 4 of the treaty, which reads:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or counties traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

And that general principle is that the canal shall be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms," and "shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State * * *" (art. 8, Clayton-Bulwer treaty), and article 18 of the Panama treaty reads:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

Panama, by the treaty with it, is given certain rights not enjoyed by others, but these are part of the price paid to it for the treaty, and the granting of them in no way violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, becauze those concessions are just as burdensome on us as on others.

DEMOCRATIC PRINCIPLES.

The exemption in the Panama act of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls was a direct violation of Democratic principles. The Democratic Party has for time out of mind declared its opposition to special privileges, and especially to that special privilege which is called a ship subsidy. In fact, the platform adopted by the Democratic Party in 1912 advocated the growth of our merchant marine so as to develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the South "but without imposing additional burdens upon the people, and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury."

It is, unfortunately, true that in the same platform there was a declaration for the exemption from payment of tolls by American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. What influences brought about the insertion of the latter declaration in the platform we may never be able to learn. The bill containing the exemption clause had not then passed the Senate, and it is asserted that the clause was placed in the platform to influence the vote in the Senate. But the former declaration which I have quoted was the one which embodied sound Democratic doctrine, and it was that doctrine which a majority of the House had voted in favor of before the convention met.

Some day we may learn that a departure from sound principle leads to trouble, and perhaps the lesson is now being learned.

WHAT DO WE GAIN BY VIOLATING OUR TREATY?

I dislike to argue from the point of view of dollars and cents a matter involving higher considerations, but sometimes it is possible to reach people only by laying a finger upon that very sensitive nerve which runs to the pocketbook.

Some of my constituents have stated in formal resolutions that the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls would build up our merchant marine. In making this claim, I am certain that they do not understand the facts fully. Our merchant marine which needs to be built up is that which is engaged in our foreign trade, and the vessels so engaged are not exempted from the payment of tolls, and no one claims that we have a right to exempt them.

The only vessels affected are those which are engaged in our coastwise trade. These are owned by persons and corporations and are operated with large profits, due not only to the volume of our coastwise trade but also to the fact that only American vessels can engage therein. And now the contention is that, having given them a monopoly of this enormous traffic, we shall also subsidize them, and by the worst form of subsidy, namely, an indirect subsidy. To put it in another way, the people of the United States having expended nearly $400,000,000 for the construction of the canal, which, it is estimated, will cost for operation, repairs, maintenance, and interest on the investment, an additional $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually, which annual charge should be met by revenue received from tolls, are urged to approve of a policy which will relieve a few people from the payment of tolls and force the people of the country to tax themselves to an amount by which the revenues will be thereby diminished. It is the old story of the taxation of the many for the benefit of the few.

WHAT LOSS DO WE RUN THE RISK OF?

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], in his wonderfully able speech on Saturday last, called attention to the fact that last year over 47,000,000 tons of American merchandise passed through the Canadian canals, and that it was estimated that about 1,000,000 tons of coastwise traffic of the United States will pass through the Panama Canal. If Canada, therefore, should undertake to discriminate against American merchandise passing through her canals, we stand to lose forty-seven times as much as it is claimed we shall gain by exempting our coastwise traffic passing through the Panama Canal. As the gentleman from Minnesota so forcibly stated, discrimination against vessels carrying wheat raised by our farmers would make every bushel of wheat less valuable and would diminish the value of every acre of land upon which it was grown.

Can anyone doubt that Canada will discriminate in view of the fact that she claims the right to discriminate and has only been restrained from so doing by threats of retaliation on our part?

We have treaties with many nations. Let us not make the mistake of assuming that this is a question between the United States and Great Britain alone. All the nations with which we have treaties are in position to discriminate against us in many ways, and it is a known fact that one nation—and a very friendly one, at that—has already commenced to discriminate because of the provision in the Panama Canal act granting exemption to our coastwise vessels.

COERCION.

But, say the opponents of repeal of the exemption clause, let us not act under coercion. But I say that honest men can not be coerced into a course of action of which they approve. To state otherwise would be a contradiction in terms.

Several of my good friends at home have warned me that to vote to repeal the exemption clause will mean the ending of my political life on March 4, 1915, and the warning has been given in an entirely friendly spirit. From what I know of the situation, I judge that they have some reason for believing as they do. As self-preservation is the first law of nature in politics as well as elsewhere, I have reexamined the question for the purpose of determining whether I was wrong from any point of view when I voted, in 1912, against the amendment of the Panama Canal bill so as to give exemption from the payment of tolls to coastwise vessels, but my reexamination has only served to convince me more firmly, if possible, that I was then right; and I am convinced that if, entertaining the views I do and for the reasons that I have given, I should now vote against the repeal of the exemption clause, those who now wish me to do so would believe that I had voted on the basis of my fears rather than upon conviction, and would decide that they did not care to be represented by a coward.

I shall vote for the repeal of the exemption clause, and if because of so doing my political life shall be brought to a close, as predicted, my private life will be lived in the enjoyment of self-respect. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER].

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Speaker, I am firmly convinced that this measure is in perfect accord with sound democratic principles, and therefore I shall give it my hearty support.

To construct the Panama Canal has cost the taxpayers of this country nearly $400,000,000 and a sacrifice of many lives, and its annual operation will necessarily lay a further heavy burden on the people.

Now that the canal is completed and ready for operation the question to be decided is, Shall coastwise vessels using the canal be required to pay a reasonable toll charge?

In my judgment the administration has placed itself squarely upon a ground-rock principle of democracy in demanding that a uniform law be passed requiring all vessels using the canal to pay tolls. [Applause.] To illustrate the fairness of this contention, if the United States Government should finance and build a transcontinental railroad, which because of its peculiar geographical location would be of great benefit to the nations of the world, upon its completion should it exempt the individual shippers of the United States from paying freight rates, while charging only the foreign shipper for the use of the property of the Government? Upon the same reasoning coastwise vessels owned and operated by corporations ought not to be granted the free use of this expensive and valuable waterway, the property of our Government, at the indirect expense of the people of this country.

I am unalterably opposed to a free-toll program for coastwise vessels; first, because it is a subsidy to grant a special privilege to coastwise vessels at the expense of the American taxpayer. The party to which I belong has always opposed subsidies and favored equal rights to all and special privileges to none; therefore this measure is in harmony with Jeffersonian democracy.

Second, because it violates both in letter and spirit solemn treaties made by this Government, and we must stand by and protect our honor with the nations of the world. No amount of sophistry ought to induce us to sacrifice or tarnish our national honor. A nation, like an individual, must carry out its treaties in good faith in order to maintain its honor. [Applause.]

The paramount issue in the question involved is, Shall we protect our national honor and support the foreign policy of the administration, or divide ourselves according to our own personal opinions upon an ill-advised interpretation of a declaration in the party platform? It is not a question now as to whether we made a good bargain or a bad one in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but it is of great importance to the American people that the United States Government shall fulfill its engagements and carry out loyally its international obligations.

Third, Mr. Chairman, this is an administration measure, and I, as a consistent supporter of former administration measures, which have proved to be wise legislation, am willing to trust to the able leadership of that wise and patriotic statesman, President Woodrow Wilson, and add my voice and vote in upholding his hands on this question, standing as he does on the firm foundation of Democratic principles. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEKE].

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Speaker, I am not required to change my position on the question involved in this measure, because as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the Sixty-second Congress I voted against the exemption of coastwise ships from the payment of tolls at the Panama Canal. My position now is the same as it was then. I voted so then because I believed that to grant the exemption to coastwise ships was a special privilege and a subsidy inuring to the benefit of monopoly in the hands of private interests. I have always believed, and still believe, that it is a sound Democratic doctrine—and if it has not been in the past surely will be in the future—that whenever an instrumentality of commerce is paid for out of the Public Treasury and owned by the General Government the use of it should not be turned over to private interests free of charge. [Applause.]

The evidence before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the Sixty-second Congress was practically undisputed that the coastwise shipping interests of this country were not in need of a subsidy or assistance from the Public Treasury, nor were they in need for their continued financial prosperity of any public aid either directly or indirectly. For nearly 100 years owners of ships engaged in our coastwise trade have had the most complete monopoly known in this country. During that time navigation laws have prohibited foreign ships from engaging in our coastwise trade. This restriction of the coastwise trade in favor of American registered ships has enabled the shipowners to earn large dividends and carry on their business with handsome profits. No claim is made that the owners of coastwise ships have not been financially successful. Their annual dividends have been very large, and they have added millions to their assets in the acquisition of additional ships necessary to transport the great volume of freight laid at their doors. It was also made clear that to grant the use of the Panama Canal free from toll charges to coastwise shipowners would in no manner reduce freight rates to the shippers. This last fact was admitted during the hearings by the largest shipowners engaged in coastwise trade. It follows that whatever benefit, advantage, and gain that would arise by exempting coastwise ships from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal would flow into the pockets of these shipowners, clearly constituting a special privilege or an indirect subsidy to private interests. In fact, it would be worse than a subsidy, for the benefits of the free use of the canal would be enjoyed by these private interests or corporations without any power in the General Government to direct how the profits should be employed by them for the improvement of their transportation facilities or the building of additional ships. They could not even be required to engage in our foreign commerce under the American flag.

The Panama Canal has cost the American people upward of $400,000,000. The annual expense of maintaining and operating it will be in excess of $17,000,000. The difference between the amount collected in tolls and the cost of upkeep and operation must be borne by the American taxpayer. I protest, first, against the discrimination, and, secondly, against fastening upon the American people this additional burden by taxation for the sole use and benefit of a private shipping monopoly.

It is difficult to understand when we hear so much about the necessity of building up an American merchant marine that tolls should be charged for the use of the Panama Canal on American registered ships engaged in foreign trade and exempt ships engaged in the local coastwise trade. It seems to be generally conceded that American ships engaged in the deep-sea trade or carrying freight between this country and foreign nations have not been prospering because of conditions that I shall not now take the time to discuss, for they are generally understood throughout the country. And if it were not against the time-honored doctrine of the Democratic Party to grant special privileges or subsidies to private interests some justification might be found for granting the free use of the Panama Canal to the latter class of American shipping interests. But search as you may, no sound reason can be advanced why the use of this canal should be turned over free of cost to the coastwise shipping interests and denied to our own shipping interests engaged in the foreign trade as well as to all other nations on earth. There is no distinction between turning over to private interests the use of a Government instrumentality paid for out of the Public Treasury, or giving the value of such use by direct payment in money to such interests out of the Treasury. But it is urged, and strenuously urged, especially on the Republican side of the Chamber, that to deny exemption from the payment of tolls at the Panama Canal to the coastwise shipping interests would be a violation of the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912, upon which platform the Democrats came into power. Personally, I do not look for light as to the meaning of the Democratic platform to the Republican Party.

The leaders in that party were unable after the election of 1908 to properly understand their own party platform. It will be remembered that in 1908 the Republican Party had promised the American people that it would revise the tariff downward. When they came into power they revised the tariff upward, and then went before the country and claimed that they had fulfilled their platform promises. We can not look with safety to a party of broken promises on domestic questions for guidance on foreign questions. It ill becomes any Member on the Republican side of the Chamber to undertake to tell us on this side of the Chamber what is and what is not a violation of the Baltimore platform. Neither can we rely upon the party that has for the first time a leader upon the floor of this House—the little group headed by the Hon. VICTOR MURDOCK, of Kansas—the Bull Moose Party. In the campaign of 1912 and since that time its creator and leader has claimed to be the champion of the common people and the foe and sworn enemy of monopolies and trusts, and yet during his incumbency as President of the United States he permitted the United States Steel Corporation to absorb the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., resulting in the organization of the greatest industrial monopoly known to the civilized world. And it has not been forgotten that the men most extensively interested in this giant industrial monopoly, and who profited most by the privilege granted by Theodore Roosevelt, furnished fabulous amounts of money to carry on his campaign for the Presidency on the Bull Moose ticket, while the great champion of social justice and his immediate followers were marching through the country undertaking to trick the electorate into voting for him by resorting to the sacred song, "Onward, Christian Soldier."

There is just one thing to do, and that is to find the right and vote accordingly. I do not deny that a vote in favor of the measure under consideration is disregarding a sentence or declaration in the Baltimore platform, but I maintain with equal frankness that a vote against the repeal of this exemption is likewise a vote against another declaration of the same platform. The platform declarations of the Democratic Party of 1912 on this question are inconsistent and clearly irreconcilable. A vote either way necessarily disregards one or the other of the two declarations to which I have referred. In this dilemma I believe it is the duty of the Democrats in this House to adhere to the old, historic declaration that has appeared in Democratic platforms for nearly half a century, and appeared in the last Democratic platform in the following language:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

The declaration in favor of free tolls for coastwise ships contained in the platform is not only of dubious origin, but its existence in the platform, I venture to say, was unknown to the great majority of the delegates that adopted the platform. I had the honor to be a delegate at large from the State of Ohio to the Baltimore convention and know whereof I speak. The platform was not adopted until after the candidates had been nominated and at a time when the delegates were tired as the result of a 10-days' struggle in selecting them. It was read to the convention amid confusion and turmoil, and scarcely anyone except the delegates who were members of the platform committee definitely knew or understood its contents on matters aside from great party questions. Even the great commoner, the able and distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, who, as it is generally understood and believed, wrote the platform, labored under a misapprehension on the toll question, as he indicates in a letter to Representative A. MITCHELL PALMER, of Pennsylvania, from which I quote:

There is an important distinction between a platform pledge on a domestic question which is under the control of the country and a platform pledge on a foreign question where our country must act jointly with others. In this case, no matter what the individual opinion of Democrats may be; no matter how desirable they may think free tolls to be, they are not at liberty to do just as they please, because they must consider, first, our treaty obligations and, second, the international effect of free tolls.

The latter suggestion brings me to a discussion of our treaty obligations with Great Britain concerning the Panama Canal, and in this connection there are but two treaties that need examination. The first is the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and Great Britain, proclaimed July 5, 1850; and as to it only one article, namely, article 8, bears upon the subject. It provides:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The next treaty between the United States and Great Britain was proclaimed February 22, 1902, and is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The following parts thereof alone bear upon this subject:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries.

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It must be apparent to any fair-minded person that under the plain provisions of these treaties, and especially the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the United States can not discriminate in favor of the ships of its own citizens or subjects and against the ships of other nations or their citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. The language of the treaty is not doubtful or involved. Any intelligent person can understand it. It means just what it says—nothing more and nothing less. The truth of it is that it needs no interpretation or construction. All that need be done is to give to the words employed their ordinary meaning. When this is done, there is no question but that the United States is precluded by reason of its own contract—for a treaty is nothing more or less than a contract between two or more nations—from granting the exemption to our own coastwise ships, which we are now seeking to repeal.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Geofry v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258–271), decided in 1890, said this:

It is a general principle of construction with respect to treaties that they shall be liberally construed, so as to carry out the apparent intention of the parties to secure equality and reciprocity between them. As they are contracts between independent nations, in their construction words are to be taken in their ordinary meaning, as understood in the public law of nations and not in any artificial or special sense impressed upon them by local law, unless such restricted sense is clearly intended.

Applying this rule of law, the United States is bound by the terms of its contract to use the Panama Canal on terms of absolute equality between all the nations of the world, including the United States.

But it is urged that the granting of free tolls to our coastwise ships is not a discrimination against other nations nor their citizens, because the latter can not engage in our coastwise trade. The British Government has the same class of coastwise trade that we have. It will use the Panama Canal in its coastwise trade. A voyage from one of its ports on the Pacific to one of its ports on the Atlantic is the same kind of trade as a voyage from an American port on the Pacific to an American port on the Atlantic. This is called coasting trade, and hence Great Britain has the same class of coasting trade as we have, and the same principles ought to and do require similar treatment. It is beyond dispute that by exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls and refusing to extend similar exemption to Great Britain that we treat our coastwise trade differently from the coastwise trade of Great Britain, and it is a discrimination, not upon the classification of trade as between foreign and coastwise, but it is a discrimination between the citizens of the United States and the citizens of Great Britain. Great Britain has a trade between Halifax and St. Johns and Montreal and all the ports of her possessions on the Atlantic and the ports of her possessions on the Pacific, just as the United States has between Portland and Boston and New York and San Francisco. She has trade between her ports in the Orient, just as we have between our ports on the Atlantic and Manila. To charge tolls at the Panama Canal on British ships engaged in similar trade certainly amounts to discrimination in favor of certain citizens of the United States and against citizens of Great Britain and, in my opinion, is a clear violation of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a more important question in this case than either the economic or legal questions which I have discussed. Even if I had a different opinion as to both these questions at this time, when the President of the United States asks for the repeal of this exemption, I would lay aside my opinion and support him and uphold his hands. [Applause.]

The President of the United States is the only official in our Government who understands fully, completely, and thoroughly, or who has the opportunity to so understand, the state of the Union with relation to the other nations of the world. This being so, he is the only official in our Government that can and must determine the needs of the hour with regard to our international relations. The very nature of our international relations precludes him from publishing in advance many matters of great concern to the American people. The people of the United States have placed their welfare, their rights, and their future peace and prosperity for the time being, in so far as they are affected by international concerns, in the hands of Woodrow Wilson as their President, and in that capacity he came to us on the 5th day of March last and spoke to the Congress in person. He said:

I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be own own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

Who dares to say that President Wilson is not honest? Who, without having all the information, can say that he is not right? Who will say that he is not able and his judgment not sound? Some here have charged the President with surrendering American rights to Great Britain; some have even charged him with cowardice. I resent these charges. There is no surrender in President Wilson. There is no cowardice in his make-up. To do right and justice, to preserve the Nation's honor, to place integrity and good faith above selfish gain, and to live up, without quibbling, to our treaty obligations constitute neither surrender nor cowardice [applause]; and you men who are making these charges will discover that when the American people are given an opportunity to express themselves understandingly they will be with him upon this great question, notwithstanding the necessity of laying aside one sentence of the Democratic platform upon which he was elected to the Presidency. [Applause.] He has asked the Congress, in support of his foreign policy, to repeal the free-toll exemption, and he has made known that unless this be done ungrudgingly he would not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence.

I am glad to say that the 19 Democratic Members from Ohio, the largest representation in point of numbers that the Democratic Party has ever had on the floor of this House, are a unit in their desire to grant his request ungrudgingly, cheerfully, and promptly. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOEKE. No; I have not the time. I was surprised and amused at several gentlemen in this debate, especially at the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], speaking in terms of love and affection of our great Speaker and commending his great patriotism in opposing the President; and yet I dare say that if the next House of Representatives should, by some misfortune, which God forbid, be Republican, there would not be one Member on that side of the Chamber that would vote to reelect CHAMP CLARK Speaker of the House. They would elect a Republican regardless of consequences. [Applause.]

It has been freely predicted during this debate that the contest over this question would split the Democratic Party. I have no doubt that that is the sincere and fond hope of many of our political antagonists on the floor of this House; and as much as I deplore and regret that the great Speaker of this House and the brilliant and successful floor leader, OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, and other able and distinguished members of my party feel it their duty to oppose the President's position in this matter, yet I am sure that when this contest is concluded, no matter how bitter it may have been or may hereafter become, it will not split the Democratic Party or reunite the Republican Party. [Applause.] When the contest is over and the vote recorded our great leaders, who have left us during this contest, will come back and join our ranks and again take up, with renewed vigor and industry, the work that remains to be done by our party to complete the Democratic program necessary to bring about the consummation of the new freedom that has been promised to the American people, thereby restoring to them equal opportunity, happiness, and prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret that I find myself unable to follow in this great controversy the distinguished gentlemen whose leadership on this side of the House I have been following for many years. I have no criticism to make of the position they now occupy. This is a matter which appeals or ought to appeal to the conscience of men and of nations. This is not a partisan matter. It can not be decided by appeals to party prejudices. I am delighted to find that upon this great question distinguished Republicans of long service in this House who have familiarized themselves, by diligent and close study, with the issues involved, are found to-day upholding the hands of the President of the United States. When our national honor is involved we ought to be able to rise above party obligations, remembering only that we are citizen of the greatest Republic the world has even seen, believing in free institutions, believing in the capacity of a great people to govern themselves. We are big enough, courageous enough, honorable enough, to keep our solemn contracts entered into with the nations of the world.

A brief review of the history connected with our Isthmian Canal aspirations demonstrates, as it appears to me, that the position taken by the greatest President the country has had since the days of Lincoln is absolutely correct and is unassailable and is the only position this Nation can at the present time afford to occupy. Distinguished gentlemen stand upon this floor and seek to avoid a contract we as a nation entered into freely and with full understanding of its terms. These same men would, with the strictest fidelity, keep to the letter any contract they as individuals might make. I do not criticize them. They are entitled to their own opinions. They evidently have developed their own convictions. How they have been able to reach the conclusions they so vigorously announce is more than I can understand.

OUR STATUS IN 1850.

Our progress as a nation prior to 1850 had been always toward the west. Our population slowly and with irresistible movement swept everything before it, and by virtue of the treaties we entered into with Mexico and with Great Britain we were enabled to establish ourselves upon the Pacific coast. The California gold discoveries in the late forties demonstrated to us the absolute necessity of some easy and inexpensive way to reach our western coast. We found another nation situated just as we were. The Provinces of Great Britain had just about as much frontage on the Atlantic as we had. They had just about as much frontage on the Pacific. Great Britain was just as much interested as we were in an isthmian canal or an isthmian railroad. A canal across the Isthmus had been the dream of the world ever since the discovery of America by Columbus, but we found ourselves in this great national emergency occupying an unfortunate position. Our treaty with England, entered into in that year, was a triumph of American diplomacy. We were not a world power. We had not dreamed of becoming a world power; we had been occupied in the business of colonizing the great West; of developing within our natural boundaries. Great Britain controlled the islands of the Caribbean Sea, the Windward Islands, the Bahamas, Jamaica, the Bermudas, British Honduras, British Guiana. Through her splendid diplomacy, extending over 200 years, she had acquired also a protectorate of the entire Mosquito Coast. She was in a position to control for herself and for her colonies any canal that might be built across the Isthmus of Panama.

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

It was at our solicitation and as the result of our splendid diplomacy that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into.

Great Britain gave up all her territorial advantages, and agreed with us that any canal built across the Isthmus of Panama should be exclusively controlled by neither nation, no matter which nation built it nor how it was built. Our agreement with England then was that "neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said canal." We also agreed that neither nation would take advantage of any alliance or influence it possessed for the purpose of "acquiring or holding directly or indirectly for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other"; and in the last clause of the treaty we agreed that any canals or railways built across the Isthmus should be "open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms." There can be no question as to the binding character upon us of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and so the matter stood for 52 years, until we entered into another treaty with Great Britain, which, it was agreed, should supersede the convention of 1850.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides, in the third article, as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations * * * on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

And under this treaty with England we built this canal. Can the English language express an obligation with greater force than this? Can there be any question as to the intention of the contracting parties? The intention was to give to the people of the United States no advantage over the people of Canada. We simply reenacted in this particular the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It is the height of absurdity, in my judgment, to insist that this is our canal; that we have built it and paid for it; that it is built within our own territory; that it is a domestic waterway; that we have just as much right to maintain control over it and to charge what rates we please and charge whom we please as we have to control traffic on a river within the boundaries of continental United States.

THIS NOT A DOMESTIC QUESTION.

This is not a domestic question affecting only us as a Nation. If it were that there was no need for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and no necessity for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. By those two treaties we made it an international question, and by those two treaties we obtained concessions from England which made the construction of the canal possible. We will be the chief beneficiaries for the reason that within the boundaries of continental United States 100,000,000 people live producing as much wealth as 100,000,000 people ought to produce. The Province of Canada contains only a fraction as much fertile land, only a fraction of our population. Her industries are vastly inferior to ours, but her citizens have the same rights under this treaty as our citizens have, and this was the reason for the treaty.

THIS NOT A DOMESTIC WATERWAY.

We have carefully avoided exercising rights of sovereignty on the Isthmus of Panama. We have recognized the independence of Panama. We have done more than that. We have guaranteed forever her independence. We have done more than that. We have rented from her for canal purposes a strip of land 10 miles wide through the Isthmus and we built the canal through the center of it, and as rental we have already paid her $10,000,000 in cash, and we have agreed to pay her $250,000 a year during the period of our agreement with her. We do not own any land on the Isthmus of Panama. The canal does not pass through territory controlled by us other than through the agreement we have made with the Republic of Panama, which I have related.

Canada is interested in trade routes within her own boundaries across the continent. Any advantage that we might gain here over her would operate to the distinct disadvantage of her citizens and to her detriment as a Province of Great Britain. It is no answer to say that the ships of Great Britain can not enter our coastwise trade; that the ships of no nation can compete with us there; that no ship of another nation can load at an Atlantic port and unload at a Pacific port. This does not remove from Great Britain her solicitude for her colony. Any cheaper transportation across the continent for our citizens than for the citizens of Canada would result in economic disadvantage to the citizens of Canada. We have a large trade with Canada. Our coastwise ships can load at New York and unload at Portland, or any other port near the Canadian line on the Pacific Ocean and ship by rail goods into Canada, destroying her own trade routes. The answer to this, of course, is that we are not interested in the development of Canada or in her progress. At any rate, this is the answer that would be made by persons taking the narrower view of the situation, but this economic condition that would inevitably be created if we violated this agreement was the reason for the agreement on the part of England when she conceded to us the rights she had gained by centuries of diplomacy in the Tropics so far as transportation across the Isthmus was concerned.

When she made these concessions, which meant so much to our material progress as a Nation, it can not be seriously insisted that she meant to abandon her own Provinces in the western world, and, knowing so well as we did in 1850 the situation, it can not be insisted that we were not fully aware of the effect of the treaty of 1850 and of the effect of the treaty of 1902. The other nations of the world do not disagree as to the effect of our treaty obligations; we may contend among ourselves as much as we please. We may boastfully state upon this floor that we care nothing for the opinion of the world—some of us may do that; that does not alter the situation. It is a source of satisfaction, however, when we reflect that this House will register in no uncertain terms, when this debate is over, its position in favor of maintaining our honor as a Nation.

THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

In 1871 we entered into another waterway treaty with England. At that time we had the canal along our northern boundary known as the St. Clair Flats Canal. The Dominion of Canada had the Welland Canal and the Laurentian Canals—methods, all of them, of connecting the Great Lakes with the seas by navigable channels. We had many differences with England in 1871 and we settled them all by the treaty of Washington. There were the Alabama claims; there were the fisheries disputes; and there was the question of the water connection between the Great Lakes and the sea. Our negotiations with England for nearly a hundred years present an unbroken series of successful international agreements. In the treaty of Washington we agreed that the subjects of Great Britain residing in the Dominion of Canada and the inhabitants of the United States should be permitted to use the Canadian canals and the canals constructed by the United States along this great waterway upon absolutely equal terms. At that time the Canadian canals were vastly superior to ours. We had engaged in canal building in this section to some degree, but we had constructed only a small fraction of the total canal mileage necessary to reach from the Lakes to the sea. Here again the concessions were all made by Great Britain. Here again was a splendid triumph of American diplomacy.

In 1885 the Dominion of Canada granted to her citizens certain rebates. She observed the letter of the treaty and charged the citizens of both nations using the canal the same rates. She imposed the same tariffs upon freights destined for Canadian ports as she did upon freights destined for ports in the United States, but she gave a rebate of 18 cents per ton on merchandise that went to Montreal or beyond that point, charging in reality only 2 cents per ton. It is interesting in this connection to note that it was a Democratic President who called attention to this violation of this treaty in a most forceful protest. The discrimination, as the result of the protest of a Democratic President, was abandoned. Since then we have built more canals, but from that day to this freights destined for ports in the United States and freights destined for ports in the Dominion pass interchangeably through canals built by either nation upon exactly the same terms. Is it possible that a Democratic administration can violate now a treaty obligation as to waterways which has been observed so recently and so literally by Great Britain in the case of the Laurentian Canals?

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM OBLIGATION.

It is contended on this side of the House that Democratic Members of this House were elected upon a platform which pledged the party to free tolls for American coastwise ships. I do not desire to discuss how that particular plank got in the platform. I desire to state that I, for one, never stood upon a plank of that character. The same party platform contained a declaration against subsidies of all kinds, and an antisubsidy plank is not by any means new in Democratic platforms. This antisubsidy plank contains the Democratic doctrine to which I subscribe. The real Democratic doctrine consists of that mass of platform declarations, of precedents, of utterances of great Democrats from Thomas Jefferson to Woodrow Wilson, which constitute the great unwritten constitution of the party. No platform declaration in opposition to it is binding upon me. Suppose the platform had contained a declaration in favor of a high protective tariff. Would that have been binding upon Democrats? It would not have been binding upon me.

REMISSION OF TOLLS A SUBSIDY.

To remit these tolls would be equivalent to paying a subsidy to coastwise ships. It was defended upon this theory by President Taft. He could find no other way to defend it. His statement, in effect, was "This is a subsidy. Other nations in the world subsidize their ships. Why should not we?" If there is any statesman in this country who is an expert upon subsidies it is the gentleman who was so overwhelmingly defeated for the Presidency by the great Democrat who is now the Chief Executive of this Nation. There was left to him and his subsidy propaganda only two States in the Union when the votes were counted, and they were among the smallest of our States.

OUR COASTWISE SHIPPING A TRUST.

Our coastwise shipping is a trust, the most dangerous, the most absolute trust we have in the country. It is protected in every possible way. We permit the ships of no other nation to engage in this trade. In fact, we have American ships sailing under the American flag which can not participate under our laws in our coastwise trade. We have fostered and coddled this industry to such an extent that it is even clamoring to be protected from the storms of the seas, and to-day we have entered upon the policy of constructing canals, inland canals, all the way along this great stretch of our Atlantic coast and around the Gulf of Mexico as far as our southern boundary, in which these pampered ships can sail in safety and without danger. In the interior of the country we have been clamoring for an outlet to the seas through the Illinois and the Mississippi Rivers, and while we have been fighting to get to the sea this coastwise carrying trust of ours has waged a successful fight to get away from the sea; and to-day the people of the interior are being taxed for the purpose of enabling this shipping trust of ours to sail ships inland along our coast, protected from the winds and the waves of the Atlantic and of the Gulf of Mexico, and every river and harbor bill contains now millions for that purpose.

THE COASTWISE TRUST COMPLETE.

There are 28 steamship lines along our Atlantic and Gulf coast operating 235 steamers. Over one-half the tonnage of these steamers is controlled by the railroads. Nearly 40 per cent is controlled by two great trusts, the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines and the Eastern Steamship Corporation. In other words, nine-tenths of the total tonnage on these coasts is controlled by trusts. These ships do not compete of course. None of our great ports on either the Atlantic or the Gulf are visited by more than one regular steamship line. New York has steamship lines sailing to all the other leading Atlantic and Gulf ports, but only one water carrier operates between New York and any one other important Atlantic or Gulf port, except Galveston, where they have both the Mallory and the Morgan lines, but these two lines are in absolute harmony. The same thing is true of Boston, except that on account of the passenger traffic during the summer months there is more than one line from Boston to Portland.

On the Pacific coast eight lines are operating. Two of them are under the control of railroads and the others do not seriously compete. The railroads control the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.'s ships, and they control the San Francisco & Portland Steamship Co. Can any gentleman present any reason why, when the temptation to combine is greater following the completion of the Panama Canal, these trusts will dissolve and the various lines will commence to compete with each other? It is no answer to say that ships can be built to compete with these trust-controlled ships. It costs from five hundred thousand to a million dollars to build a ship which could enter into any kind of competition. It costs an enormous sum every day to operate such a ship. Any ship built to compete with this coastwise shipping trust of ours could be driven from the seas in a few weeks of time.

THE TEHUANTEPEC ROUTE.

We have now two principal rail-and-water routes for carrying freight from coast to coast. The Tehuantepec route, by way of the railroad across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, owned by the Mexican Government, is absolutely under the control of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co.—still another coastwise steamship trust, operating in entire harmony with all the others—and freight is carried by this route on 21 steamers from New York to Pacific and Hawaiian ports. And then there is the Panama route, by way of the Panama Railroad, owned by our own Government, and by way of the Panama Railroad steamship lines, owned by our own Government; but this route, so far as the Government owns and controls it, ends at Colon. There freight for Pacific ports and for Hawaiian ports is taken up by the Pacific Mail Co.'s steamers, a $20,000,000 corporation controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad, operating in entire harmony with our other coastwise trusts. In fact, all these combinations of coastwise ships act in absolute harmony, and together constitute one great trust, the greatest carrying trust in all the world.

For a while there was competition between our intercoastal rail-and-water routes and our transcontinental railway routes, but that competition ended years ago. There is now no fixed differential between the railroad rates and our intercoastal water rates, but it is admitted by the water lines that they are to-day making their rates with reference to the rail tariffs. Not long ago the president of the American-Hawaiian Line, in his testimony before the Senate committee, frankly admitted:

We are on friendly terms with them (the railways). We discuss rates.

SHIPPER WILL NOT GET BENEFIT OF FREE TOLLS.

Under these circumstances can it be successfully maintained that the shipper will get any benefit from free tolls? Freight rates are now fixed with reference to transcontinental railway rates.

If we permit coastwise ships in our intercoastal trade to go free through the canal, we simply hand them a subsidy, amounting, on an average, perhaps, to $10,000 each time a ship goes through. We might just as well pay it from the National Treasury. Out of the kindness of their hearts do we expect this coastwise shipping trust to give shippers the benefit of the remission of tolls? We can only expect them to do what any other combination under similar circumstances would do—add it to their profits—and the profits of this particular trust of ours are known to be enormous already.

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN TO THE INTERIOR IF THESE SHIPS REALLY COMPETED.

If there should be real competition between the transcontinental rail lines and the intercoastal shipping lines, it is not too much to expect that it will not be long until rail lines carry ocean-to-ocean freights at a loss. Rail lines carry freights over certain routes now at a loss, but they always recoup these losses. Whenever rail lines along a river find it necessary to compete with river lines, they compete at a loss, but recoup their losses by charging higher freights a few miles back from the river. We can expect them to do the same if shippers receive the benefits from the remission of tolls the proponents of this theory claim they will receive. There is only one way for railroads to recoup any losses they may have in this particular, and that is to charge shippers who live in the interior higher freights for merchandise shipped from the interior to the sea and from the sea to the interior. In other words, only that fringe of our population living along the shores of the Atlantic and the Pacific would get the benefit of this sort of competition. All the rest of us would be subject to this burden. They would profit at our expense.

CANAL OUGHT TO BE SELF-SUSTAINING.

The Isthmian Canal ought to be self-sustaining. The tolls we get from the canal ought to pay the interest on the bonds we have issued in aid of its construction. The tolls ought to pay also the expenses of operating the canal, and they ought also to pay the $10,000,000 per year the people of this country will be compelled to expend on the military program which has been adopted for the armies we must, under our policy, keep there and the enormous fortifications we must maintain. No one seriously believes that we can operate this canal without some annual deficit. If we permit these trust ships to go through free, we will be adding enormously to the deficit. In other words, the people living in the interior, if the free-tolls policy should prevail, and in the event of real competition, as the proponents of free tolls claim there will be, will be subjected to a double burden—increased freight rates to the sea and from the sea to the interior and also the burden of taxation necessary to meet the canal deficit.

There is no way, in my judgment, no logical way, by which a free-tolls policy can be defended. If questions of national honor are not to be paramount—and they certainly ought to be—if we are to look only at the selfish side of the question, then we have only to look at the selfish side in order to determine where our advantage as a Nation lies.

THE GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

Canada is about to enter upon the building of the Georgian Bay Canal, a 25-foot waterway leading out from the Great Lakes to the sea, wholly within Canadian territory. When this waterway is built ships can load at any port on the Great Lakes—ocean-going ships—and can unload at Liverpool without breaking bulk. Ships engaged in the world's carrying trade can, when this canal is completed, without entering our territory, reach the great wheat sections of the Dominion of Canada. Can we expect Great Britain and her Canadian Provinces to adhere to the treaty of Washington if we violate the Hay-Pauncefote convention? They are exactly similar in effect.

If we violate our agreements with reference to an isthmian canal, we can expect Great Britain to retaliate when the Georgian Bay Canal is completed, and the effect on our progress as a Nation of the complete control by Canada of the Georgian Bay Canal will be felt to an extent not dreamed of at the present day. The price of wheat on a Dakota or an Illinois farm depends upon the Liverpool price and the cost of getting it to Liverpool. If our ships are to be admitted to the Georgian Bay Canal upon the same terms as the ships of Great Britain, we are thereby placed at a tremendous disadvantage, and we thereby lessen the price at the farm of every bushel of grain raised on American farms, and we thereby also affect the earning capacities of all of our factories in the interior engaged in manufacturing for export. If we are to look only at the selfish side, we ought also to look just a few years into the future and see what retaliatory measures Great Britain can take at the demand of her Canadian Provinces if she is disposed to adopt retaliatory measures.

ONE CHAPTER OF DISHONOR AT PANAMA ENOUGH.

In 1846 we entered into a solemn treaty with New Granada, now Colombia, with reference to transit across the Isthmus, in which treaty, among other things, we solemnly agreed to guarantee the rights of sovereignty of New Granada, now Colombia, over the Isthmus of Panama. The events preceding our construction work on the Isthmus are fresh in the minds of all of us, and two or three years ago an ex-President of the United States in a speech to American citizens proudly boasted that he "took Panama." We violated our solemn treaty obligations entered into with a weak South American Republic, because we were big and were able to do it, and the wrong we did them has not yet been righted by this Government. In the face of such a record as that can we afford to write another chapter of national dishonor and can we afford to violate another treaty solemnly entered into?

Three weeks ago the President of the United States, standing at this desk, in this Chamber, asked that we repeal this law which so seriously violates this treaty and asked the support of Congress, and in concluding his brief address said:

I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

The President of the United States has endeared himself to the people of this country as no other President, except Lincoln, in a hundred years has been able to do. If any man on this side of the Chamber doubts the statement of the President he had better conceal that fact from his constituents. He will be held to the strictest accounting, and he ought to be; and yet there are men on this side of this Chamber who openly defy the President of the United States, who are willing to question the position he takes, and who seem willing to charge him with misrepresenting a matter so serious to us as a Nation. Those motives of self-interest and selfishness, which, after all, control the actions of so many of us; that honesty which ought to prevail among nations; that fidelity and honor which ought to characterize individuals and nations, all point in one direction and in one direction only—the request the President makes should be ungrudgingly granted. In order to maintain our high position among the nations this act which violates our solemn treaty obligations should be repealed. I expect to vote for its repeal. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the treaty of February 22, 1902, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, says that—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nations, or its citizens or its subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such condition and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Mr. Speaker, the term "all nations" as here used does not, in my judgment, include the United States, but does include all other nations except the United States; hence Congress can, if it desires, pass our American ships through our own canal free of tolls. Why should it not? Have we not built this canal with American money, through American territory? Have we not placed our eastern and western American coasts 8,000 miles nearer than they were before? Have we not practically doubled the strength of our Navy? Will we not reduce the cost of railroad freight one-half from coast to coast? Were not these the main reasons why we have expended, in round numbers, $400,000,000 in building and fortifying this canal? Did we not fortify it to prevent its control by any foreign power? Did we perform this, the greatest of all human undertakings, for the benefit of all other countries or for our own? This question answers itself. England and, unfortunately, our President seem to think that we built it for all other countries and not for ourselves. I therefore wholly disagree with the President's contention that we must to save our national honor repeal this law. I agree with him that this free-tolls law should be repealed as an economic question, and for that reason only shall I cast my vote for its repeal. I voted against its enactment and have not changed my mind since I so voted in 1912. I believed that I was right then, and I know that I am right now in voting for its repeal.

I hope, however, that the Senate will amend this bill by declaring—that nothing in this act shall be construed so as to estop this Government from hereafter granting free tolls to its citizens.

Mr. Speaker, our American ships engaged in coastwise trade now have a monopoly of that trade as against the ships of all foreign countries. No ship not carrying our flag can carry its cargo from our Atlantic to our Pacific coast through our canal; therefore this law now gives our shipowners a monopoly of our coastwise trade as against the ships of all other nations. Shall we, in addition to this monopoly of our coastwise trade, also add a bounty by giving them free tolls through our canal? Do you not think that these shipowners should be satisfied with the monopoly they now possess of this vast coastwise trade? In asking for this toll-remission bounty the coastwise shippers of this country clearly prove that greed is never satisfied. Are not the people of this country, who have paid for this canal, entitled to some consideration, and should they not have at least the interest and maintenance charges of the canal refunded to them by the collection of tolls and its payment into the United States Treasury? What reasonable man will say nay? We have, in order to build up our merchant marine, given our shipowners a monopoly of our coastwise trade, and unless we repeal this law we will also give them a bounty equal to the amount of tolls remitted. No man desires more than I to see our flag on every ocean and the supremacy of our merchant marine in the world's trade established; but the giving of bounties for this purpose has been opposed by the platforms of the Democratic Party throughout its entire history, and for this reason I take pleasure in voting to set aside the free-tolls plank in the Baltimore platform and in repealing the law giving free tolls to American ships passing through the canal. Is it ever too late to correct an error, even if it does find its way into a Democratic national platform? Is such a platform so sacred that no error can creep into it? I hope the time may never come in the history of this country when any party can not undo a wrong. When did our Republican friends ever before have so much respect for a Democratic platform as they claim for the free-tolls clause in the Baltimore platform? When did they become the keeper of the Democratic conscience or the expounders of that faith? Let me warn my Democratic friends to beware of Greeks bearing gifts. Will Democrats follow the advice of these gay deceivers who seek to rend our party in twain and to thus rebuild their own desecrated and deserted altars? Did not these same sneering, faultfinding Republicans disdain their party platform when it declared for lowering the tariff wall? Did they not raise it higher by enacting the Payne-Aldrich bill a few years ago? Did they not in recent years in their platforms declare for separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, and did they not proceed at once to disregard their platform pledges by trying to combine them into one State? I would advise my critical, overvirtuous Republican friends to first cast the beams out of their own eyes before pointing to the mote in ours.

Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, I must confess I do not understand the system of logic employed by some of the advocates of free tolls in claiming "that England is discriminated against by the exemption of our ships engaged in coastwise trade," when, under the law, she can not now and never could engage in that shipping trade. We now prohibit all other nations from engaging in our coastwise trade, and the term "all nations" certainly includes England, and if she can not enter that trade at all, how in the light of common sense can she be discriminated against? Are not all other nations now prohibited from competing with our ships, and is there not thus created a monopoly of all of our coastwise trade in favor of our own ships, as I have before fully explained? What treaty rights does the President believe we are violating in preventing all nations from engaging in our coastwise trade?

What right has England more than any other nation to say that she is discriminated against by the free passage of our ships through our canal? If the President were a doctor, I would say that he had incorrectly diagnosed this canal-tolls case in saying that we had violated the treaty of 1902 with England. But he has offered the proper remedy for the trouble by asking for its repeal on the economic ground mentioned in his diagnosis. The following letter, just received by me from New Orleans, sustains my viewpoint as above stated. It is as follows:

MARCH 26, 1914.

Hon. JOHN H. STEPHENS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The New Orleans Association of Commerce, the largest commercial organization in the South, is strongly opposed to the repeal of canal-toll exemptions for American coastwise vessels. We believe we voice the sentiment of the thinking people of the Gulf coast ports in this matter. We fail to see how the repeal of this clause would in any way benefit foreign shipping. We also fail to see how the retention of this clause could in any way harm foreign shipping, due to the fact that it involves coastwise or domestic commerce only and in which foreign shipping is debarred from competing in any event. We think not sufficient stress has been laid upon this essential distinction. American ships passing through the canal and trading in foreign ports will pay the same tolls as ships of foreign nations with which they compete. * * * We hope that the fight now waging against the attempted repeal will be successful, and desire to have our protest recorded in Congress. Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL of this State is familiar with this organization and our attitude on this question, as is Representative and Senator-elect ROBERT F. BROUSSARD and other members of the Louisiana delegation in the Senate and in the House.

We can not see in what possible manner the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is involved in a question which concerns American domestic commerce only. We earnestly hope you will vote against the repeal of this clause.

Very respectfully,

NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
Per M. B. TREZEVANT, General Manager.

I agree with the conclusions of the writer as expressed in this letter, for the reasons stated therein; instead, however, of voting against repeal as he advises I shall vote for the repeal of these canal tolls exemptions, and thus compel the shipping interests of our coast cities to content their yearning subsidy-hunting souls with the shipping monopoly given them by our Government. No doubt this New Orleans association of shippers and shipowners are anxious to further deplete the United States Treasury by remitting to themselves the tolls they should pay to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I resent the radical, and in some instances the abusive, statements of some of the speakers on both sides of this question. Why should the President or the Speaker of this House or any of our Democratic Party leaders be personally assailed and their motives impugned because they perchance differ from the views of some individual speaker? The honesty, patriotism, and intelligence of all these men are above reproach. Let Democrats leave to our political enemies across the aisle of this House a monopoly of the privilege of fault finding and vituperation of any Democrat on either side of this question.

Mr. Speaker, it amuses a Democrat to hear our stand-pat Republican opponents raise the cry of gag rule by condemning the Rules Committee for limiting debate on this bill. Mr. Speaker, gag rules limiting debate and prohibiting amendments were invented 20 years ago by a Republican Speaker, Mr. Reed, and improved upon, patented, and copyrighted by that great Goliath of the Republican Party, Speaker Cannon. Democrats were gagged by these rules for 16 years. I for one am in favor of hanging these modern Hamans on their own gallows. The Bible teaches us "that as we make our bed so we must lie upon it"; so let Republicans take their medicine like little men. The opponents of this bill revile the President and taunt Democrats and Republicans alike for voting for this repeal bill by saying that we are driven by the President's bull whip to thus vote. In 1912 a majority of the Democrats of the House, including myself, and also several Republicans, voted against its enactment—the same reasons that impelled us to vote against its enactment impel us to vote for its repeal; hence the President's present position has nothing whatever to do with my vote on the repeal of this law. On the other hand, he is reported and quoted at that time as being in favor of free tolls, so the truth is that Mohammed has come to the mountain. Mr. Speaker, it does not lie in any man's mouth to truthfully shake his gory locks at me and say that I had changed my views at the dictation of any man or set of men. I regret exceedingly to part company with the Speaker and other leading Members of this House on this most important question. I can not do otherwise and retain my self-respect. I also have the greatest respect for the President of these United States and propose to uphold his hands in the present great national crisis, believing that his wise and just foreign policies will prevent war with Mexico and lead to an era of peace and good will among the nations of the earth.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BALTZ].

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied in my own mind that the principle of this bill repealing the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act is entirely correct and proper. I am going to vote for the bill because I am unalterably opposed to class legislation. I can see no good reason why American coastwise ships should pass through the canal free and the people of the United States put the money into the pockets of the corporations. We have had enough of that kind of class legislation—special privileges to a few at the expense of the many. The doctrine of the Democratic Party has always been and will be equal and exact justice to all and special privileges to none. The manufactured idea by the corporations creeping into this debate that if we pass this bill it will be bowing to the will of Great Britain is all bosh and nonsense, and the American people know it. The people of this country do not want any deadheads to pass through the Panama Canal. They want every ship to pay the toll for the purpose of paying the expense of operating the same. Now, let us do the right thing for the people and pass this bill. It is nothing more nor less than a sound business and economic proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I opposed the rule to limit debate and shut off amendments to the pending bill, because such a rule is undemocratic, and, from my viewpoint, wholly unnecessary in this case. It did not appear to me that there was any emergency so great as to justify the violation of every tradition, precept, and principle of the Democratic Party, and render any such rule either advisable or excusable. Gag rule has no place in the nomenclature of the Democratic Party. A majority sufficient to adopt such a rule is certainly sufficient to carry the main question, and any Democrat who would vote for this rule in order to facilitate the bill will vote for the bill. Others who favor the bill and intend to vote for it could, consistently, and did, vote against the rule, and it is manifestly unfair to class any Democrat as hostile to the bill merely because he opposed the rule. I opposed the rule without hesitation, and I intend to vote for the main bill with absolute assurance and conviction of right and duty.

What are the arguments advanced against this bill, and from what source does the attack come? The Democratic leaders on this side defend as against the bill, but do not attack nor question the sincerity and the motives of the President, but from sincere conviction, as well as consistency with themselves, their former attitude, and their party platform, oppose the bill by means of fair and legitimate argument. Who assails the position of the President? Who questions his motives? Who prate long and loud about loyalty to party pledges and fidelity to party platforms? These attacks all come from the Republican side of the Chamber, from a party whose pathway for half a century is strewn with the wreck and ruin of party platforms and broken pledges, from a party which has become a political outcast, wrecked on the reefs of party perfidy, and stranded on the shoals of dishonor and the betrayal of sacred rights and obligations to the people.

I revere every fundamental principle enunciated in the Democratic paltform, and I concede the right to no Democrat to violate the same with impunity. I regard the essential principles of the Democratic Party, those which distinguish it from all other parties, as sacred and inviolative. One of these essentials is couched in the terse phrase, "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none." A party platform is an executory contract with the people, and when it is found that some strange, spurious, and nonessential utterance has found its way in some mysterious fashion into a party platform, in contravention to the spirit, essence, and intent of the contract itself, it becomes the duty of every Democrat and all in authority to repudiate the spurious plank with the least ceremony and in the most summary way. Such is the attitude of the President and the purpose of this bill, and neither the President nor any member of his party owes any apology for the position taken, nor is there need of explanation. Some Members favor repeal of the exemption law because of economical reasons, some because they believe it violates treaty obligations, and still others find reason and logic in both arguments. Economic reasons alone would be sufficient to control my judgment and actuate my vote if none other pertained. The canal has cost the American Government approximately $400,000,000; it will cost millions annually to maintain and operate, without any adequate return. Why should special privilege in the form of exemptions from the payment of toll be granted to a great American shipping trust engaged in coastwise trade on the Pacific coast? Let some one give a sufficient answer to this question and I will yield my contention. It will be time enough for me to favor tolls exemption when some one tells me how my constituents in Illinois, who will be called upon to contribute to make up the deficiency over and above receipts for the operation and maintenance of the canal, will profit by being taxed for subvention or indirect ship subsidy in order to foster and encourage the shipping interests of the Pacific coast and the building up of a giant monopoly which, without competition, carries that class of freight accessible to the coast and which, by reason of its character, can be carried by water more cheaply than by rail.

A further reason for the position taken by the administration is found in the claim that the free tolls provision sought to be repealed violates our treaty obligation pertaining to the right of all nations to use the canal on equal terms without discrimination as to tolls, which reads:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

In the light of all the facts which have been disclosed in the course of this debate, and after applying every rule of construction, I am convinced that the letter of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is violated by the act exempting certain shipping interests from the payment of toll, but I can not agree with those who contend that any violence is done the spirit and intent of that treaty, and in this view of the case I seriously question whether the enforcement of the provision exempting American vessels from the payment of toll for the use of the Panama Canal fairly involves any question of national honor. But why draw fine distinctions, quibble about words, and haggle over phrases? It is sufficient to know that, in the judgment of mankind and in the opinion of all enlightened nations, exemption is regarded as a violation not only of the letter, but of the spirit and intent of the treaty, and that to enforce the exemption law is to subject us to world-wide criticism, discredit, and dishonor among the nations of the earth, thereby rendering more difficult the amicable settlement of the several diplomatic complications with foreign countries, all more or less serious, now hampering, harassing, and annoying the President in his foreign relations. Complaint is made that the President has not taken Congress and the country and the world into his confidence and made public the reason for the request contained in his special message relating to this subject. The ridiculousness of this position affords its own answer. For my part I am content to act upon the declaration of the President made under the solemn obligations of his high office, without asking him to divulge secrets, in violation of every tenet of wise diplomacy.

We are on the brink of war with Mexico and our relations with Japan are portentous, if not alarming. If we become involved in war with one, we will be with the other. Such a war, both on land and sea, as this alliance would entail would involve thousands of American lives and millions of treasure. It is the hope and aim of the administration to avoid war and perpetuate peace. God speed the President in his desire and effort. Great Britain maintains the most cordial and intimate relations and political alliance with Japan, and has the good will, the ear, and the confidence of the de facto government in Mexico. What is the consideration for the good offices of Great Britain in enabling us to dispel these ominous clouds? What is the price of peace, if we may judge aright the import of the President's message? Merely that we, as a nation, maintain inviolate and with national honor our treaty obligations; nothing more. That we accord to all nations the use of the canal "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic." Peace with honor is the hope and the dream of the world to-day, and peace with honor at this juncture and critical period of our national existence is within our reach. The opportunity is here. Shall we avail ourselves of it? This is one of the questions, and to my mind the most vital question, involved in this proposed legislation.

"He that is faithful over a few things, I will make him ruler over many things." Thus will the people speak when the judgment, the courage, and the patriotism of Woodrow Wilson, now assailed, is made an issue at the polls. You gentlemen, to whom the wish is father to the thought, talk about a disrupted party, but you will find that you are reckoning without your host when the people have spoken on the question of tolls exemption. The Democratic Party, neither disheartened by temporary reverses, nor dismayed by long and continuous defeat, always steadfast and faithful to principle in the hour of defeat, as well as in the flush of victory, with an eye ever single to the common good and the best welfare of the whole people, has kept the faith and in one year redeemed every essential promise which it has made, and will not lose the confidence of the public nor suffer at the polls by reason of a temporary division between party leaders on a question not fundamental in its party creed. Tariff revision, so long denied by the Republican Party; the income tax, which distributes the burdens and requires wealth to contribute to the support of the Government in proportion to its demands for protection and favor; currency reform, with the confidence and stability given the financial system of the country, universally sanctioned and approved by business men everywhere, are reforms consummated and pledges redeemed that make a record of loyalty to principle and fidelity to party platform unsurpassed, and it is useless for us to fear and idle for the enemy to hope that a party which has accomplished these reforms and redeemed pledges of such great moment will be repudiated by reason of the rejection of a spurious plank, a mere nonessential in its platform. Wisdom to see and courage to do are distinguishing characteristics of our great President, and in his wise and courageous efforts to avoid national dishonor and avert war he has my most loyal, unswerving devotion and support. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH.]

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, this tolls question is evidently a contest between the railways and the shipping trust. Each is playing the game, with the usual number of "decoys" that are in evidence in all such contests. That is a condition that we can not help, but we must treat the problem and other problems from a practical economic standpoint.

I am not fearful of England. If ever we have a war with England, it abrogates all treaties and other relations until the war is settled, and the United States will be in possession of the canal unless England can take it by force, which I do not believe. [Applause.]

For economic reasons I am opposed to ship subsidy. I do not consider England's wish that the United States repeal the law exempting from toll American ships engaged in coastwise trade when passing through the Panama Canal. England's view of the matter, whatever it may be, does not change the economic problem, and it is upon economic grounds that I stand opposed to free tolls. All this talk about dignity, independence, and patriotism as grounds to oppose the repeal was from its inception manufactured to influence us to put the burden of a shipping trust upon the people. To be patriotic at the expense of the people is fashionable here in Congress.

I originally voted against giving the Shipping Trust free use of the canal. I am confident I was right then, and now that I have another chance to vote upon the same question I welcome the opportunity to again vote against free tolls, a burden previously voted upon the people by a majority in Congress.

I am sorry that any Congressman should imply so weak a Government as to believe it necessary to equip one trust to curb another. In the first place, the trusts can not be relied upon to do it. In the second place, and by far the most important, the Nation should deal directly with the trust problems. If it can not do that, the people are doomed to perpetual industrial slavery. [Applause.]

Let us suppose, however, that Congressmen do really believe that the evil of trusts may be curbed by their competition with each other. Where would that land us if we were to try it? We know that the cities and territory adjacent to deep-water navigation have a God-given advantage in transportation facilities over the cities, farming, mining, and manufacturing sections in the interior. The effect of free tolls will be to give to the coast territory still greater advantages—artificial, so to speak—over the interior than it already has.

Let us assume the truth of the statement made by Members of Congress that railway rates would be made to compete with water transportation. What would the result be? We know that most of this country served by railways is interior, away from the seas and navigation. The most of the freighting for our people must be done by rail.

The railways have their investments and equipment upon which the courts hold they are entitled to a reasonable profit to be collected from the people. A great proceeding is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission in which the railways are seeking to raise their freight charges, because they claim they do not get the profit which the courts say they are entitled to. Now, if the railroads are compelled to make the rates lower along the coast territory and through rates from coast to coast, they will be getting still less returns from that business. In order to make up enough to pay them "reasonable profits," they would increase their freight charges in the interior. That would compel the people of the district which

I represent, and of other districts similarly situated, to pay the equivalent of the tolls and a profit on that.

Either the Interstate Commerce Commission is useless or it has the power to raise, lower, and adjust railway rates to meet the demands of justice. The only competition the Government should provide is its own. I believe in all cases that the people who get the services should pay for them, and that they should never be charged to those who get no benefits. I shall not favor a ship subsidy, and I am glad to vote to repeal the law granting one. Neither will my vote estop me, nor need any Member consider himself estopped, from construing the existing treaty between the United States and England according to its intent, whatever that may be, for it is not involved in the economic problem of canal tolls.

There has been a vast amount of eloquence expended upon this problem, but I have not heard anyone yet speak of the most important element in the future strength of the Nation; it is that economic justice shall be established so that men and women may secure the results of their properly applied energy. If ever the Nation has another war, it will be the plain people who will have to win the battle. If the Nation establishes economic justice, they will support it with dignity and honor. We can rant and fume here about our foreign policy and about the fortifications of the canal. To regard the good will of other nations is well worth while. The nations should come to an understanding, for all this armament is a direct charge upon the working people. They bear the burden. To fortify and defend the canal against the ill will of the world would cost the people of this country enormous sums. It is time that all the world begin to think of the cost of war and the preparations for it. Here is what was stated by David Starr Jordan in an article in Harper's Weekly December 20, 1913:

War has made the earth, with all its riches, a bankrupt concern in the hands of its creditors. The nations of the world still owe nearly $40,000,000,000 in gold for the cost of the past wars. But one great nation has made a beginning toward the repayment of these debts. Were it not for war no nation would ever need to borrow a dollar, and the interest paid yearly on this uncountable sum is small compared with the cost of the wars which are now on. Germany and France and, after them, England and Russia, with their satellites, are engaged in war to-day, war all the more repulsive because not one of them knows what they are quarreling about. Not actual fighting now, nor at any future time, for none of these can get the money to begin, while those unwary nations which have actually fought on borrowed money are exhausted in men and credit for half a century to come. The cost of war, past and present, is felt every day in the increase of taxation; that is, in rising cost of living throughout the earth. The civilized world is an economic unit, and whoever wastes any part of its substance in this degree robs the pocket of each one of us. There is no way of abolishing poverty that does not first strike at the root of waste.

War cripples the nation physically by cutting off without posterity its strongest and boldest men. The key to national strength in the future is found in the good percentage of to-day. Like the seed is the harvest. This is the law of heredity. It applies to nations as well as to families, to men as well as to the lower beasts. No nation has ever fallen save through failure to breed from the best. Rome fell when she ceased to breed Romans. Greece declined when her children were no longer Greeks. The evil effect of reversal of selection—of allowing the weak, the diseased, the timid, the cautious, the greedy, all those whom war could not use, to serve as fathers of the new generation—is the dark cloud which overshadows the history of Europe. So long as "we send forth the best we breed" for war and imperialism, so long shall we at home breed from the second best, and we shall have all the ills of slum living, of weakness and incompetence, dark shadows in days of peace cast by the splendors of war, for, as Benjamin Franklin sagely observed, "War is not paid for in war time; the bill comes later!"

In an introduction to a review of the negotiations which led to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty James Henry Harper, now of Washington, D. C., who has an intimate knowledge of all the mazes of the Isthmian Canal problem, says:

In 1898, 20 years after the opening of the move to stage a locked canal in the eyes of the American public, whose Government had always given their attention to the discovery of a sea-level route, the opening of negotiations by President McKinley for a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was begun in December of that memorable year.

Within two years an understanding had been reached, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed by the representatives of the two Governments and sent to the Senate for ratification. Here began the effort to upset the two main points in the historic document—nonfortification and equality of treatment of all commerce in the use of the canal—by an effort for fortification and the preferential treatment of American shipping. The former was rejected by the Senate 25 yeas to 44 nays and the latter 27 yeas to 43 nays. The only change was the elimination of article 3, inviting other powers to adhere to this convention.

Originally this treaty contemplated and in effect agreed to a limitation of armament, thus meeting a sentiment well in advance of its critical stage, now as apparent to those taking the view so aptly expressed by David Starr Jordan in his article in Harper's Weekly entitled "Shall we fight?"

When we view war in this light, its true light and its terrible shadows, and realize the great step here taken—its value to all the nations and generations to follow—we can appreciate the purposes of the Queen of England and the President of the United States and their effort to save us the costs and pains of war. They had a realizing sense of all that war entails upon nations and individuals—the terrible strain upon the hearthstone and heartstrings of the home, the unit of these two great Celtic nations. Upon the safety and happiness of the fireside they rest secure. When the home is in peril all statesmanship must unite for its preservation, for upon the loyalty of the family and its real protection, the true function of all law, lies the only safe course for these two great nations whose traditions and blood are one.

It was no mere sentiment that inspired these heads of the foremost nations in all that makes for national greatness, for "righteousness exalteth a nation."

Wars have already cost these nations too much. The cost of maintaining the navies of 10 nations is more than a billion dollars a year and their armies one and a half billions more, while interest on war debt, including pensions and upkeep and maintenance, exceed $10,000,000,000 annually. Our share approximates $1,000,000,000 and is mounting higher and higher. We now have a man in the Army and Navy for each 100 voters, costing three or more times as much for housing and maintenance as it takes for the average American. Shall we increase the ratio, with all it means of wrecked lives and wasted energy, half-starved children, women ruined, and the continued lowering of the morals of the Nation?

Fortifications and their manning will double that sum in two decades at the rate of increase since we entered the twentieth century.

Is it not time to call a halt? Will the people tolerate it longer when they realize that the money we squander every year on the pageantry of war would give each man and woman a fine suit of clothes and have enough to pay for the proper clothing of all the children in the land? The fortifications at Panama and increase in the Navy on the present program for the next decade will take another suit of clothes off the backs of the toiling millions of this country for each of those years. Do you think they will stand for it just to see their Uncle Sam on dress parade, with the gold braid and all that goes with it, carrying a chip—yes, a stupid block—around on his shoulders?

President McKinley was fully persuaded of the wisdom of Franklin's saying that "War is not paid for in war time; the bill comes later!" He had just come through another war and knew well the mounting bill of that one in which he, a youth, got his "shoulder straps" and for which our children's children shall yet be paying.

It was no dream, then, that led him to seek to minimize the possibilities of any future mounting of the mortgage we have put upon the generations yet unborn by the "pomp and pageantry of war" which has made the cost of living soar all over the world. Note well the fact that interest is the white man's burden, under which his back is breaking, and that the gold to pay it in is cornered.

The fortifications of an isthmian canal were estimated to cost $100,000,000 and their upkeep and manning a third of that sum every year. This charge must be made upon the shipping going through the canal or paid by those who never got a dollar of benefit, as well as those who might possibly, from this canal.

It was both statesmanship and good politics that declared for nonfortification and at the same stroke got England, with her $2,000,000,000 police force, at a cost of a quarter of a billion dollars a year for maintenance of that police force of the world's highway, to undertake the job of maintaining, both for us who pay the freight and herself, the greatest carrier upon the seas, the safety and freedom thereof.

We must not forget the fact in our efforts to curb the trusts, and President McKinley did not in dealing with this question, that these shipping combines that monopolize God's highway are held in check by the British tramp ship, the one and only independent competitor. These tramp ships are all that stand between the occasional shipper and the combines and hold down the rates. It was in their interest—this great group of freemen of the seas—that Queen Victoria realized the wisdom of keeping down the tolls, and so consented to saving us the hundreds of millions of dollars in original outlay and the tens of millions annual charges that fortifications and naval armament meant for all.

It was not a dream but an awakening to the fact that the whole world was looking askance at the foolish burden put upon them by this pageantry of war and its demoralizing effect upon the morals and manners of nations and individuals. It was in contemplation of the next step, the curtailment of bills that follow wars, that our martyred President sought the way through this treaty.

It is to the Christian statesman now at the helm, who to-day sees the righteousness of living up to a bargain that will make for unity and true friendship (not traditional) of all English-speaking people of the world, that we turn hopefully. To us comes the opportunity to bring peace and good will to all mankind in the opening of the gates between the oceans.

The monument we want to set up to mark our celebration of the centennial of peace between the English-speaking world should be inscribed with the declaration of the English world for "Peace by limitation of armament." No less could be done by us to set the pace than the prompt removal of friction over a foolish declaration of independence of all the world in our management of the canal and its fortifications. The Book declares "no man liveth to himself," and in a larger sense no nation can live outside the family of nations.

It is high time all this talk by hyphenated Americans of our being able to take care of ourselves shall forever cease. The Celtic bond should be written where all could read. When that is done another century will see universal disarmament. All freemen of the world will applaud our stand and bless this day and generation.

Let the monument be set up, equal to the marking of this epoch, second only to one other in the history of humanity, and there will be joy in heaven and angels shall light the pathway of the Republic.

Let us only demand the restoration of the principles laid down in the original treaty as signed by these two representatives and assented to by their governments when presented to the Senate.

The eyes of all mankind are upon us, and their hearts are with us in ushering in the dawn of a better day.

NOTE.—England subsidizes all ships which are so built that their decks will carry the heavy guns and whose holds can be used for the transport of troops by paying half the cost of construction. Here is a suggestion to rehabilitate our merchant marine. She also supervises the building of the free ships and does not allow a dollar of the money subscribed by preachers, widows, and orphans for the building of them to go into any promoters' pockets; no overhead charges, as our country allows. Here is another suggestion: If any money is raised by stock subscription to build ships here, every dollar should go into the ship, and no water be added to its stock; then, like the British tramp, we could carry freight to any port and take a cargo home, carrying it at a profit and in competition with them. When we do, then and only then will we return.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in view of certain statements and criticisms that have been made on the floor since the beginning of this debate, I feel that justice to myself requires that I make a few remarks in explanation of my vote. I shall not enter upon a detailed discussion of the many questions involved in the repeal of the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act. I will content myself with a short explanation of my votes. I have already cast two votes on preliminary questions. The first was on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] for the previous question on the rule. In other words, that motion was to close the debate and bring on a vote for or against the adoption of the rule. I voted for the previous question, because for 3 hours we had listened to a debate, or a so-called debate, on the adoption of the rule. We all know that not exceeding 10 minutes of the entire 3 hours—180 minutes—were devoted to a discussion of the rule. The other 170 minutes were used in talking about every subject under the sun save and except the one under consideration—the rule.

I was not in favor of continuing a farce such as this had developed into. I was opposed to further time killing and voted for the previous question, which stopped debate and brought up for consideration the rule itself. The people are not interested so much in what we may say here as they are in what we do. It is easy to make fair promises, but our votes are the only yardstick by which these promises can be measured. If a man talks right and votes wrong the people will not be deceived. If a man votes right and does not talk at all the people will not forget him.

THE RULE.

Mr. Speaker, the rule proposed reads as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of House bill 14385; that said bill shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and the same shall be the continuing order of the House until disposed of; that there shall be not exceeding 20 hours' general debate on the bill, to be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill, 10 hours of such time to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], 5 hours to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], 4 hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], and 1 hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY]. At the conclusion of such general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion, except one to recommit: Provided, That all Members speaking upon said bill shall have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD, and that all Members of the House shall have the right to print remarks upon the bill during not exceeding five legislative days.

I voted against the rule because it prohibits amendment of the bill when we shall reach it for passage. You will note the rule contains these words:

At the conclusion of such general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill to final passage without intervening motion.

I have said several times before on the floor of this House, and I repeat it now, that the one thing which more than any other caused the American people to lose confidence in the Republican Party and scourge it from power, and give their confidence and send here as their representatives the Democrats, who hold office from President Wilson down, was the outrageous rules of the House of Representatives under Republican administration. The "gag rules," by which individual Members of Congress were prohibited from expressing their views and setting forth the wishes of the people who sent them here and forced them to accept the dictation of bosses, did more to discredit the Republican administration in the minds of the people than any other single act on their part. The provision of the rule which I have just referred to is practically the same weapon used by Joe Cannon in his palmiest days of disregard for the people's wishes. It is the same autocratic power which we Democrats denounced in our national platform adopted at Denver in 1908. It is identical with the conduct of the Republicans when they controlled the House. At that time we could not find voice loud enough with which to denounce them for their stifling of representative government. Former Speaker Cannon approves of this rule. He said in an interview in the Washington Post in its Saturday morning issue:

Should a rule be required for this purpose it is all right to be sufficiently drastic to meet the needs of the situation. * * * So far as I know there has never been anything either in my experience or in the legislative history of the civilized world which quite compares with it.

The people of the United States are reading and thinking more and more every day. Political bosses, ring rule, secret caucuses, and midnight conclaves will not be approved by the American people. If the legislation we propose is in the interests of the people, publicity and a full and free discussion will not injure us. On the contrary it will add strength to our position. The American people condemned "Cannonism," and the American people will condemn "gag rule," no matter from what source it comes.

I am not surprised at former Speaker Cannon's commendation of the rule, for it is the offspring of his brain. On the other hand, that sturdy old Democratic oak, the Speaker of this House [CHAMP CLARK] true to the faith that was in him when he stood on the floor of this House as minority leader, and denounced "Cannonism" and Republican "gag rule," in an interview in the Washington Post of Friday, March 27, said:

I am dead against the rule on the tolls question, and intend to vote against it. I will not stultify myself by voting for any such rule. I led the fight to liberalize the rules and practices of the House, thereby imperilling my political future. We won that long and bitter fight, and it was the first Democratic victory in 18 years. Time and time again I declared that I would not advocate a thing when in the minority that I would not advocate in the majority.

The Democrats won the House in 1910, the first time in 16 years. I was unanimously nominated for Speaker, and duly elected by every Democratic vote in the House, with the hearty good will of every Republican, because they believed that I am a truthful man. In order to liberalize the rules and practices of the House I voluntarily relinquished a large portion of the powers of the Speaker, which I could have retained by making a fight, but I honestly believed that the Speaker had too much power under the old system for the good of the House and of our institutions.

Among other things I declared that I was in favor of throwing bills open to ample discussion and amendment, and I am going to keep the faith, come what may. If I were to vote for the pending rule, I could not look the House in the face. When I made that statement I was speaking particularly of tariff bills, but my statement is equally applicable to all great bills.

We could have passed this bill like we passed the rule by ordering the previous question at any time it appeared there was an attempt to filibuster. This would have given everyone an opportunity to offer such amendments as he desired, and if they were not acceptable they could have been voted down. I, for one, would very much like to see a provision in the repeal act specifically saying that we repeal the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act for economic reasons; that by so doing we do not surrender our right to interpret our treaties without dictation from England or any other European monarchy; that the Panama Canal is the property of the people of the United States, and that they reserve the right to do with it as they see fit. I think the repeal bill should be so worded that no foreign nation in the future could raise the question that the United States has no right under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to pass its ships of war through the Panama Canal free from toll without extending the same privilege to the battleships of other nations. In so far as the repeal of the free-toll provision is urged on treaty grounds it does not appeal to me. I think the Panama Canal belongs to the American people; that it is located on American soil; that it was built with American money contributed by American taxpayers; and that the American Congress can do with it as it may see fit.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the repeal of the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act. My vote for this repeal will be cast because of economic reasons. I can not for the life of me see any difference between a direct appropriation from the United States Treasury in the way of a subsidy to steamship companies and the remission of tolls to vessels passing through the canal. In the one case we would pay the money out of the Treasury. In the other we would fail to collect from ships passing through the canal the tolls they owe. The purchaser and consumer will not benefit by free tolls. The money that the United States will lose will not be deducted from the freight rate. The rates will not be changed, and the money will find its way into the pockets of the Steamship Trust. It alone will be the beneficiary. It is conceded by those who are opposed to the repeal that the income from the canal will not be sufficient to pay the expense of operating it, keeping it in repair, and paying the interest on the $400,000,000 it cost the people of the United States to construct it. It is also conceded that the tolls will fall short about $5,000,000 in meeting these expenses.

Then, why do we surrender to the Steamship Trust about two millions of dollars? It is estimated by competent authority that the tolls on freight, which, under the provision we are attempting to repeal, if allowed to pass free, will result in a loss of about two millions of dollars. If this $2,000,000 is not collected from the Steamship Trust, the people of Oklahoma will be required to pay a part of it. I shall never vote for a proposition that will take money from the pockets of my people and give it to the steamship monopoly. But they say the Democrats are pledged to free tolls, and they quote that plank in the Democratic platform which reads as follows:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

My colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] in his speech the other day said:

I am most astonished at the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who last spring joined that little column who wanted to adhere to the Democratic platform for a provision prohibiting interlocking directorates and against an asset currency, and for a bill that would give the farmer a system of rural credits; but I find him now faint and weary at the roadside as our little column marches by. It is our duty first to keep our faith in interlocking directorates' prohibition and to pass the farmers' credit plan we made to the people before we are so anxious to violate a platform pledge to our own people in order to please England. * * * A man who violates his party platform, as is sought to be done here twice, will find himself retired to a very private retreat.

I am glad to pay tribute to the ability of my colleague and to his fidelity to platform pledges. I know and cheerfully bear testimony to the fact that he stood foursquare to every wind during the fight on the currency bill to redeem platform pledges by incorporating in the bill a provision against interlocking directorates; a provision extending the benefits of governmental aid to a system of farm credits. I was with him in that fight. I also know that he has on every occasion stood up and fought and voted for the redemption of that platform promise adopted at Baltimore which favors the enactment of a law that will require the President to make public all indorsements on which Federal judges are appointed, because he and I fought together there also. I do not disagree with him at this time on the sacredness with which our promises made to the people before election ought to be lived up to after we have been trusted with power. I agree with everything he has said. I also agree with the great Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan. He said in a speech delivered before the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, at Harrisburg, the capital of that State, on May 13, 1913:

The fact that we not only have platforms but that the platform is becoming more specific year after year is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it. As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government, I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. I have heard it said by men after election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant; and I frankly tell you that I believe no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should do a thing that his conscience condemns; but does that mean that he should violate his platform? No. It means that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election. I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzles money intrusted to him.

I approve of every word uttered by Mr. Bryan and stand squarely on them in casting my vote at this time. I also approve of every word uttered by the President in his speech delivered to the farmers at Washington Park, N. J., August 15, 1912, when he was a candidate for President. Speaking with reference to the binding force of a platform, he said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along business lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before; and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

I do not dispute that the provision for free tolls for coastwise vessels is in our platform, and if it were the only platform declaration on the subject, quite a different question would be presented; but that provision is not the only word in the platform where we touch on this question. I call attention to that provision of the platform adopted at Baltimore under the head of "Merchant marine," and which reads as follows:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the South; but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

That the remission of tolls is a subsidy I take it no one will dispute. Mr. Speaker, no longer than last Friday, the 27th day of March, 1914, in the Senate of the United States, the distinguished leader of the Republican minority in that body—Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire—in the course of a colloquy with the Senator from my own State [Mr. OWEN], admitted as much. Senator OWEN asked the question:

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, will concede that the remission of tolls is the same thing as a subsidy, will he not?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, it is exactly the same thing.

I believe in the binding force of platform pledges, and I believe so firmly in this that I do not think a man who accepts office on a platform and immediately violates its provisions is fit to represent a Democratic constituency on this floor. But where I am confronted by two platform pledges, as in this case, both of which it is impossible to keep—for it you live up to one you must of necessity violate the other—it does not require any great length of time, nor does it give me any trouble, to decide my course. I shall follow the pledge which is in the interest of the people and I shall violate the one which would assist in upbuilding a monopoly and result in profit to a trust.

Mr. Speaker, all this talk about the transcontinental railroads being in favor of the repeal of the free-toll provision of the Panama Canal act is entirely without foundation; in fact, these statements are made in the hope of catching those who are not acquainted with the facts. Everyone knows that all the transcontinental lines of railway own steamship lines as well, and everyone also knows that it would be an easy matter for the railroads to transfer their stock in the steamship companies to dummies who could hold it for them. By doing this the railroads would collect from the Government in the way of free tolls from ten to twenty thousand dollars every time a shipload of freight is sent through the canal. This argument is made for the purpose of deceiving the people, and is on a par with the charge that has been made so often on this floor, that we, by repealing the free-toll provision, are truckling to Great Britain. Neither of these so-called arguments weighs one ounce in determining my vote. I have carefully considered the subject and have come to the conclusion that free tolls is economically unsound. I do not believe it a good governmental policy to take from the American people to whom these tolls belong and give them to the steamship monopoly. I do not believe it right to surrender these tolls to a trust and force our hands into the pockets of the American taxpayers and take the millions of dollars that will be required to maintain and operate the canal and pay interest on the bonds we issued with which to construct it.

For these reasons I shall vote to require all vessels passing through the canal to pay for the benefit they receive by reason of the shortened journey from coast to coast.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for a few minutes simply to state my position on this important question of exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

I was against free tolls two years ago, and I have heard or read no argument since which would cause me to change my views. I intend to vote to repeal the exemption. I did not vote before because, like most of the other Members from Ohio, I was at home attending a primary election.

The people of this country have paid $400,000,000 to dig and fortify the Panama Canal. This the country has done ungrudgingly, proud of its gift to the world of a great international waterway, but after having done that, is it right, is it just to tax the people for all time to come to maintain and operate it? Why should not those who use it pay for such use? Why should it not be made as nearly self-sustaining as possible? Why give this bonus, this subsidy—for the remission of tolls is nothing short of that—to a special interest, a shipping trust that now has a monopoly of the coastwise trade? No other nation is permitted to engage in our coastwise trade. Why tax the people solely for the benefit of this special interest? And right here I would call attention to the fact that ship subsidies have almost uniformly been urged as a means to secure foreign trade. It is the desire that our ships shall go into foreign climes and secure the commerce of the other nations that lends force to the argument for subsidies. But if we are to grant subsidies even to coastwise shipping, why not permit the Government to select the lines and the type of vessel it would subsidize? From an economic standpoint it seems to me we are bound to admit that a grave mistake was made two years ago in adopting free tolls for coastwise vessels.

But now we come to another aspect of the matter that, while apparent two years ago, was not given the serious consideration that the situation demanded. To my mind there is not the slightest question but that we have violated the plain terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty entered into with England and dealing with the subject of the Panama Canal. The language of this clause in the treaty is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The exemption in the Panama act which we are asked to repeal reads:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The language of the treaty does not say that the canal shall be free and open to vessels of all other nations, but of "all nations." Now, the President has come to us and asked us to do the right thing, the large thing, and, in fact, the only thing we can do and preserve our national honor. And the question is, Are we big enough, are we broad enough, are we fair enough to acknowledge our mistake and correct it before any injury results? Not because we have to do so at the behest of any nation, but because we want to, because it is right, and thus place ourselves before the other nations in a manner befitting our citizenship. With the President rests the responsibility of maintaining our integrity in our foreign relations. He has come to us and said:

I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please.

The integrity of our purpose is questioned and our national honor is at stake. He says it is a fact and a situation that he presents, and I am willing to take his word for it. What will become of our efforts to obtain the trade of our neighbors, the South American Republics, with every State there arrayed against us on account of the construction we, two years ago, adopted of this treaty in exempting from tolls our coastwise vessels? No advantage that could be gained by insisting upon favoritism for American coastwise shipping would compensate the country for the damage that would follow impaired confidence.

If you say that a clause in our party platform approves the exemption, I say to you that I never did indorse that clause, and for you who two years ago favored this exemption, surely fuller information and maturer consideration show it to have been a mistaken policy. I put national honor and my oath of office above a platform sentiment. On all great issues a platform is binding. On nonpolitical matters of policy I prefer the judgment of the majority of my party who in Congress considered and voted on this matter. That majority, after due consideration, voted against the exemption. I was against it then and I am against it now, and intend to vote to repeal it. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOWDLE].

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, I have just been meditating over the fate which would have awaited that Member of this House who, if the canal had not been dug, had gotten up and seriously proposed giving to our coastwise steamship corporations as a subsidy a determined portion of the interest on four hundred millions of money spent in digging the Panama Canal.

Suppose some Democrat had arisen in his place and, after some sentimental words of affectionate concern over this coastwise trust, had actually proposed that these huge interests, so lately headed by a man just out of the penitentiary, be given, say, five millions annually, what do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, would have been the fate of that man?

Well, if he had kept his scheme bottled up until after 2 o'clock the morning papers would have destroyed him, and if it had gotten out before 2 o'clock the afternoon papers would have fixed him for the political graveyard.

I am here to say that no Democrat and few Republicans could survive making the barest suggestion that our powerful coastwise ships, already protected against the possibility of foreign competition, be given a dollar of gratuity from the Public Treasury.

Why, then, should the digging of this canal make any difference? Does the canal make that shipping less a trust?

Mr. Speaker, on what dream-producing food have we been lately feeding, that we are now affectionately interested in bestowing rich gifts on a shipping combine which we have so recently investigated? Why this change of front?

Why, Mr. Speaker, I have here before me three volumes from the Government Printing Office, entitled "Investigation of Shipping Combinations, under House Resolution 587." This investigation was held by the Committee on the Merchant Marine of this House, of which committee I am a member. The resolution under which the investigation proceeded recites that the committee shall inquire diligently into all "combines * * * for the purpose of fixing rates or of giving and receiving rebates, special rates, or other special privileges, or for the purpose of dividing their earnings, or for the purpose of preventing or destroying competition," and so forth.

These reports are now before our committee for the purpose of enabling us to recommend to the House some remedial legislation. And it is going to tax this House to find some way of controlling these combines which will be fair to the public.

But the point is that our coastwise shipping, already in combines, and which has been under investigation, has now become the special object of national bounty, and it is proposed by those who oppose this pending bill that we shall hand over to it an additional special privilege. What a farce! Of what are men thinking? And how can a Democrat, who came here in a movement which was energized by opposition to special privilege, pretend to oppose this bill?

Mr. Speaker, I have lived to see the day when, after investigating a combine, some of us are prepared to crown its brow with tributes of admiration and bounty. Why should we not reasonably expect to see the day when the Standard Oil Co. is voted the Nation's thanks and when its presiding genius is canonized?

A good many of our plain citizens, especially those who live in the Central States and have no experience with shipping, wonder how it comes about that our merchant marine, of which we have so little, becomes a powerful combine in our coastwise trade. To them I should like to say that in our coastwise trade our ships own it all. They own it by law a half century old. That law forbids foreign ships engaging in it. Thus a cargo in New York awaiting transportation to Charleston, or to Seattle when the canal is opened, must infallibly go in an American ship. Not content with this, we have another old law which provides that a passenger shall not go from one American port to another, directly or by way of a foreign port, in any but an American ship under penalty of a fine of $200. Thus the freight and passenger traffic between our ports is fully protected by prohibitions transcending any mere protective tariff ever passed. It is under these protecting special privileges that our combines in shipping have formed. And at present neither party is proposing to change this ancient law. This special privilege nobody is proposing to cancel or diminish, though many doubt the wisdom of it. It is under these laws that our coastwise trade has become fat and at times arrogant. Now, while our merchant marine is small as compared with the merchant marine of the other leading nations, yet our coastwise merchant marine is very large. Our entire coast trade, both freight and passenger, is in its exclusive hands.

I have spent a moment in describing our merchant marine owning this special privilege, because if this infant, which now owns 14,000 steamships, is to receive another stimulating bonus, our plain citizens, who are to dig up the taxes, should know all that it is possible to know about their baby.

But, some men may say, the canal must be used by ships, and can not be used for walking, so how does this canal benefit us unless our ships get the benefit? The canal, my friend, does not take away the ancient privileges of our coastwise trade just alluded to. It does not even diminish them—it vastly enlarges them. Our coasts are now united. The field of operation of our merchantmen is doubled. This field will be entirely in their hands. It will not be possible for an English steamer to take a New York cargo to Seattle.

If this 14,000-ship combine came to this Capitol and asked for one further privilege it would be kicked out; but, not being able to ask directly, it is doing it indirectly. It is filling the air with dust, making men yelp, "Treason," "Truckling to England," "Surrender of sovereignty," and so on, hoping that under cover of all this to secure this free-toll subsidy. Be it known that England is not asking to interfere with our coastwise trade. She is not asking that any of its special privileges be diminished. What she is claiming is that free tolls to our already privileged shipping is a violation of the equality-of-treatment provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Tolls or no tolls, English ships will not carry a single ton of our coastwise freight.

So much, Mr. Speaker, in my effort to let the plain citizen know who it is and what it is that is expected to get his bounty.

The minority report on this bill, written by the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] contains this amazing deliverance, among other things:

The talk of subsidizing the shipping interests at the expense of the American people is mere sophistry and only befogs the issue. The tolls imposed at the canal would be added to the freight and paid by the American people who consume the commodities.

Mark Twain, speaking of a certain speech, said that had the speaker spent his life in the acquisition of ignorance he could not have delivered a finer valedictory. The ancient sophistry involved in this report entitles it to high consideration. By this argument it may be proved that any freight charged anywhere, being added to the goods, is finally paid by the consumer, and hence no freight charge at all would relieve the public.

By this it may be proved that any taxes paid by me is finally paid by the public, because taxes tend to impoverish me and curtail my dealing with the public. By this argument we might vote a pension to knaves as freely as to just men, because knaves need precisely the food, clothing, and shelter that just men need, and hence the pension money comes back to us. By this argument charging anyone with burglary becomes ridiculous, because the stolen goods are still in and with society, though the owner be shorn of them. The whole special-privilege scheme of things might be generously defended by this minority report heresy.

But if there were a shred of truth in this claim, which would not be defended by any person outside of a madhouse, I should like to ask how the merchants of Ohio or Indiana are to be benefited by this bonus to the shipping combine. Our goods out in Ohio must still have rail rates. Their interstate traffic will not use the canal. It is coast-to-coast freight that will use the canal in the main. We, the central State taxpayers, are simply expected to pay for the canal. Of course I am aware that a general benefit is somewhat reflected, but this generally distributed benefit is scarcely expected to directly enthuse taxpayers charged with paying and meeting the interest on upward of $400,000,000.

Those making use of this new and expensive agency of the world's commerce should pay for it is a proposition that will be grasped by every thoughtful person in America. And this fair proposition does not involve diminishing in the least the ancient special privileges of our 14,000-ship coastwise merchant marine.

Having touched upon the economic evil of handing a bonus to a shipping combine and augmenting its already valuable special privileges, I turn for a moment to the international features of the situation.

In this House, Mr. Speaker, on the 4th day of last December I was deeply impressed by a brief speech made by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], a Republican of long and honored service here. He was speaking on the Hensley peace resolution, then before this House, and he was expressing his fears lest that resolution, even though passed unanimously, would produce no impression abroad. This Republican Member said:

It is one of the unfortunate things in the recent career of this country and the record of our Congress, for which each one of us is more or less to blame—and I confess my share of it—that we have not respected our international obligations and our international promises and our international treaties, and for that reason we are distrusted and even disliked.

And further, speaking of the acquisition of the Panama Zone, he said in the same speech, page 189:

In the case of Panama there was great difference of opinion among us as to whether or not we violated the treaty with Great Britain and Panama concerning the question of tolls. But on the other side of the water they believe that we did violate that treaty. They believe that the United States would violate it for its advantage; and, more than that, in that connection the question as to whether we did violate that treaty was one capable of arbitration under the agreement which we ourselves had urged and for half a century had loudly advocated, but we have refused to abide by that treaty and have refused arbitrating that question under our solemn agreements.

These words, Mr. Speaker, coming from this distinguished Member and speaking of the conduct of this House and Senate in recent years should alarm every thoughtful man who reads them. I need not dwell on the high reputation of this Republican Member for integrity and probity. He knows the history of this House, and he frankly tells it to our shame. What guaranty of perpetuity has this Nation or any nation whose history will justify such words?

But, Mr. Speaker, efforts have been made to retrieve our lost position among the nations. President Taft, knowing all that Mr. STEVENS knew, and more (for he was in closer touch with international opinion by reason of his office), on the 24th of August, 1912, in signing the Panama Canal act wrote a certain "memorandum to accompany" that act, and in it he said:

In a message sent to Congress after this bill had passed both Houses I ventured to suggest a possible amendment by which all persons, and especially all British subjects, who felt aggrieved by the provisions of the bill, on the ground that they are in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, might try that question in the Supreme Court of the United States. I think this would have satisfied those who oppose the view which Congress evidently entertains of the treaty and might avoid the necessity for either diplomatic negotiation or further decision by an arbitral tribunal.

Thus, at the very outset of this difficulty, at the very moment of signing this complained-of act, the then President, knowing of England's protest, tried to find a way by which some impartial authority might interpret this treaty; but Congress declined the suggestion.

Still later, on the 5th day of January, 1913, speaking before the International Peace Forum, at New York, he said, as reported in the New York Times:

When the time comes there will be no doubt about what I will do about submitting this question to an impartial tribunal. I am willing to arbitrate with Great Britain as soon as we get down to the point at issue. A good many people are saying "Don't arbitrate, because you are going to lose. This is our canal, and while England is making a point of it, England would not fight about it, and, therefore, why give up when you are not likely to get an arbitration that will be satisfactory to you?" Now, even if this view were correct as to probability of result, which I need not and do not admit, that is just the time when I am in favor of arbitration. This is the time that tests your faith in that method of settlement.

These are brave words. There is nothing of jingo in these words. A man who utters such words is not only a believer in peace, but is a worker for peace. Such a man does not prate about peace and then give the offense which brings on war. Such men do not urge their Congressmen to vote against battleships because the cost of one would reforest the Appalachian Mountains and then urge him to acts the effect of which must inevitably bring on that international hate which is the forerunner of war.

Mr. Speaker, I am a Democrat, but I pause to honor this spirit manifested by the late President.

And I venture to assert that at this time we, of all people, need the good will of the nations. Just now an immense effort is being made to extend our trade. Our mechanical apparatus of production is so great that, long since having occupied our own market, we must have world markets. My own correspondence indicates how great is our wish to extend our trade. Many letters ask me how we can induce foreign nations to let down the bars a little more. In the face of all this, how true do the words of President Wilson become when he says in his recent message:

The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

And such withdrawal, Mr. Speaker, loses for us nothing, simply nothing, and gains for us again the respect of the nations, which has been heretofore lamentably impaired.

In taking this view, that we lose nothing and gain much, I am not alone; far from it. The most conspicuous Republicans in this House have used stronger terms than any Democrat has yet used. I well remember what Mr. GILLETT, the distinguished Republican Member from Massachusetts, said yesterday:

I opposed free tolls then on the ground that it was probably a breach of the treaty and that it was economically preposterous to subsidize in this manner our coastwise fleet, which was a flourishing monopoly, and except from the subsidy our vessels engaged in foreign trade, which were in dire need of some assistance to preserve them from complete extinction.

Those Republicans who have the effrontery to charge us Democrats with betraying the Nation's interest must answer to their colleagues, for they are thus fried in their own fat.

It is interesting to note how the friends of the coastwise special interests, owning upward of 25,000 ships, steam and sail, attempt to conceal their designs by shouting, "This is in the interests of the transcontinental railroads." They yell about one combine to conceal their efforts to aid another. The curse of the modern situation is the special interests, and these have "run and been glorified" under the peculiar patronage of the objectors to this repeal bill and their party.

I appeal to the plain people of this country not to be deceived by this effort to free a shipping combine from paying the cost of maintaining this canal, which it is about to use, by any such cry from men who have spent their political lives in serving special interests—men who have sullied this Nation's honor in the past by their legislative course, to which my distinguished friend Mr. STEVENS has bravely called attention.

We are safe in assuming that when this canal is opened we shall be charged all the traffic will bear. What honest rates we have secured from the railroads have been by dint of careful oversight and hard work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In order to secure fair rates via this canal the commission will be obliged to be very watchful. I know, of course, that that commission has no jurisdiction—yet—of such transportation, but it is well known that this House is now meditating the extension of the commission's jurisdiction, for it has long been thought that the people needed some check on all-water rates. But thoughtful men will not be deceived.

Some persons have a ready way of saying "ours" when speaking of this coastwise shipping. Well, it is "ours" in the same sense that the Standard Oil Co. is "ours." The railroads are "ours," but we watch them closely, and it costs us millions annually to watch them. To watch "our" big interests is an expensive performance. For one, I am not giving them anything; I am demanding from them.

But it is said that since foreign countries subsidize their vessels, why is this remission of tolls not a good way for us to do the same thing? In the first place, foreign nations do not subsidize their vessels in any flat, horizontal way as this. England and Germany when subsidizing carefully select the sort of vessel and the trade line which they desire to aid. They subsidize, when they subsidize, in a way that tells for the Government in time of war by the type of vessel aided and in time of peace aids the weak trade lines which may give promise of commerce. But the proposition here is to give a horizontal bounty to a combine which already enjoys enormous and exclusive privileges. Such subsidizing is unknown to Europe, and among us is repudiated as "preposterous" even by those who believe in the principle of subsidy. This proposition out-Herods any Herodian subsidyists in existence.

But the special-privilege advocates pipe up, "What was the use digging this canal? What good flows to us from this work?"

Well, for three-quarters of a century and more this Government has desired to join its distant coasts, and for the past 20 years that desire has been accented by the growing needs of national defense. The coming of the Spanish-American War and the quickly enforced journey of the Oregon around the Horn rendered that desire acute. The cutting of the Isthmus completely meets this necessity. This profound element of value is certainly ours. Mr. Roosevelt in his message of December 2, 1902, said, when no thought of treaty interpretation was before him:

> This canal will be of great benefit to America and of importance to all the world. It will be of advantage to us industrially and also as improving our military position.

The industrial advantage is to be found in the closer commerce of our joined coasts, which is in the exclusive control of our coastwise ships, and in the nearness of all Pacific ports of South America and the Orient to which we can send our goods by the carriers of the world.

Those monorail minds that see no good unless it flows to us alone will be shocked to observe that Mr. Roosevelt deemed this canal of "importance to the world." I do not belong to that class of astigmatized vision. With the world in rags we can not be prosperous. It is only with a world prosperous that we can be prosperous. Trade which does not aid the other fellow is a skin game. The curious thing about trade is that it is something at which both win. If wretchedness exists beside riches, it can be for but a short time—both suicide.

And as to a "surrender of sovereignty"—what nonsense. Does Ohio surrender her sovereignty over a pike because all using it pay tolls? Does England surrender her Suez control because all ships receive equal treatment? Does Canada surrender control of the Welland Canal because our ships and barges receive equal treatment with her own? Let us not forget that we control the canal, police it, fortify it, make all rules for its operation, and absolutely fix toll rates for all ships using it, subject only to section 1 of article 3 of the treaty, which reads:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

And that there may be no doubt about our control at all times, article 2 of that treaty provides:

> It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

What could be clearer? And how can any man, careful about the honor of his country, declare that these provisions do not commit us to equality of treatment of all using the canal. No argument can fritter away these provisions, except the highly sophisticated and stealthy arguments under which the special interests for 50 years have been allowed under law to loot this country.

But men say, Why are we willing to give England equal rights in this work of ours? Why, ever since cutting the Isthmus was contemplated England and the United States have had an agreement concerning it; and no agreement that these high contracting parties have ever had contemplated anything but equality of treatment to all shipping. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. POST] has pointed this out in his excellent speech. In the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 it is stipulated that—> the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of the convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same.

Article 8 contained a provision to the effect—> that the same canals or railroads, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain afford.

And that treaty, unlike the present one, contemplated a joint military protection to any transisthmus canal or railroad which might be constructed by private parties, for at this time it was thought that private capital could be induced to construct it. Why, for a half century any canal or railroad across the Isthmus was deemed to be of such great value to us that we stood ready to back such a venture with England, and this "for the benefit of all mankind."

And if anybody thinks this equality of treatment to be most generous and unusual, let him read article 1 of the convention covering the use of the Suez Canal, agreed to at Constantinople October 29, 1888:

> The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to every vessel of commerce or of war, without distinction of flag. Consequently, the high contracting parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the canal, in time of war as in time of peace.

No, Mr. Speaker, we did not dig this canal for England. We dug it for "mankind." The best symptom of modern life is that men are now interested in mankind. Trade has been the chief creator of that interest. We had an enormous national interest in digging it; and we are happy to know that the size of England's merchant marine made the digging of it the more possible, for her ships—giving the canal about one-half of all tollage that will be received for many years to come—make a reasonably low toll possible and provide for the cost of operation, itself an item above ten millions annually.

Mr. Speaker, the scheme by which this Canal Zone was acquired from Colombia aroused the hostile comment of the world. Let us make some reparation, if possible, and see to it that what was conceived in sin is consummated in righteousness.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, the object of the present bill is to repeal that clause of the Panama Canal act which reads, "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States." As a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I voted to report this bill favorably to the House, and I intend to vote for its final passage. I take this position because I believe that to exempt citizens of the United States who own ships from the payment of tolls is to grant a special privilege to a few of our citizens at the expense of others and is in violation of the fundamental doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. I take this position, also, because I believe that the present law which exempts coastwise ships of citizens of the United States from the payment of tolls is in violation of a solemn treaty entered into between the United States and Great Britain.

The building of the Panama Canal was the most gigantic and expensive undertaking in the history of the world. This canal has been built at a cost of approximately $400,000,000. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has estimated that the annual charge to meet interest, sinking-fund requirements, cost of operation, and maintenance of the canal will amount to about $16,000,000. This vast sum comes from all the people of the United States. I believe the benefits of this vast expenditure should come to all the people of the United States without discrimination. To allow part of the people of the United States to use this great canal free of tolls would be to grant them special benefits that are not granted to the other people of the United States.

The opponents of this bill say, "Since the United States has expended this vast sum, shall not the ships of the United States receive the benefit?" They say, "Since our people have expended this money and incurred the risk of this great undertaking, shall not our people receive the benefits?" I ask the question, Who do you mean by "our people"? Do all the people of the United States own ships? Do the merchants, the bankers, the men who work on the railroads, the men who work in the mines and on the farms and in the factory, do these men own ships? We are apt to forget that the men who own ships in the United States constitute but a small part of "our people." Since the canal was built by all of our people, the benefits should go to all of our people without discrimination. Since only a few of our people own ships that will go through the canal, is it not right that those few who own ships should pay reasonable tolls to the rest of our people who do not own ships? Whether we take money from the Public Treasury and give it to the few men who own ships, or whether we give these few men the free use of a canal that cost a vast sum of money the result is the same, it amounts to a subsidy. That this is a subsidy has been officially admitted. In the instructions of the Secretary of State, of January 17, 1913, to the American chargé d'affaires at London, as a reply to the contention of Great Britain, he says, "The exemption of the coastwise trade from tolls or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting or from refunding those tolls will fall solely upon the United States." But, they say, even if it is a subsidy to the shipowners, they want this remission of tolls not for the benefit of the shipowners but for the sake of reducing transportation charges that will benefit all the consumers. I say to you the reduction of freight rates and transportation charges as the result of this canal does not depend upon the remission of tolls.

The building of this canal reduced the distance between eastern ports of the United States and western ports by many thousands of miles. This is the great fact that will make water transportation possible and profitable and result in cheaper transportation. It is the elimination of these thousands of miles of sea and not the remission of tolls that will make it possible for coastwise ships to compete with the transcontinental railroads. The men best informed admit that the charging of tolls will not hamper our coastwise trade. It is already the most prosperous coastwise trade in the world. The law now gives them an advantage on the business by preventing the ships of other nations from engaging in this trade. I do not believe that even a fraction of the money remitted to the owners by this exemption from tolls will ever reach the shipper and consumer in the form of reduced rates. These companies engaged in the coastwise trade will make the rates just enough less than the railroad rates to get the business. They will charge all the traffic will bear. I am also reminded that the transcontinental railroad rates do not depend upon competition by the water route, but the Interstate Commerce Commission already has the power to fix reasonable rates.

The opponents of this hill would have us believe that unless we remit these tolls the people of the United States will receive no benefit from this enormous expenditure of money and from this wonderful achievement. I deny this. Our people, including those who own ships and pay reasonable tolls through this canal, will be benefited by the fact that the Pacific Ocean has been connected with the Atlantic Ocean and the distance from New York to San Francisco has been decreased by many thousands of miles. This will unite our people in closer bonds of commercial intercourse. It will stimulate the interchange of our commodities. It will quicken trade and result in greater prosperity not only to shipowners but to all the people of the United States.

I do not impugn the motives, the integrity, or the judgment of the men from whom I differ on this proposition. I do not support this bill because, as some have alleged, the so-called Ship Trust may be opposed to it, nor because, as some have alleged, the railroads may be in favor of it, but I give it my ungrudging support because as a representative who should legislate for all the people I believe the present exemption is in conflict with the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

I also give my support to this bill and thereby vote for the repeal of the present law because I believe the present law is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I realize that at first blush as American citizens we are apt to say, "We built this canal, we own the land on which it is built, and we have a right to do as we please with it." It is natural to feel at first thought that we are just as free to do as we please with this canal as we are with our inland rivers and harbors and other parts of our domain. But before coming to this conclusion we must stop to consider under what circumstances this canal was built, and also the relations of this canal to the rest of the world. It is helpful in considering this important subject to remind ourselves of the geography of the situation. This canal which is built across the Isthmus of Panama unites for purposes of commerce the great Pacific Ocean and the Atlantic Ocean. All the great commercial nations of the world front on one or the other of these oceans, and these great oceans sustain the relation of public highways to these great nations. Naturally almost from the very beginning of the development of this Western Hemisphere the leading nations of the world have felt a keen interest in the project of a canal that should connect these great oceans. Realizing the importance of this project to our national welfare, this Nation entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with Great Britain in 1850 whereby it was agreed that any canal which would be constructed was to be under the joint protection of both Great Britain and the United States, and was to be maintained and operated on terms of equality between the United States and Great Britain and any other nations which might wish to cooperate in the joint protection of the canal. We entered into this treaty voluntarily and gladly, because at that time we were not in a position to build the canal ourselves. This treaty which prevented us from building this canal without the consent of Great Britain was superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty entered into in 1901 between the United States and Great Britain. By article 2 of this treaty it is agreed that the United States shall have the right to construct the canal, and that subject to the provisions of the treaty shall enjoy all the rights incident to construction.

Section 1 of article 3 of the treaty provides:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It is contended by the opponents of this bill that the United States was not included in the words "all nations observing these rules." This section together with the other sections of article 3 provide the basis of neutralization of the canal. The opponents of this bill contend that these rules are laid down for the guidance of foreign nations and not for the United States, and that the term "all nations" means in reality "all other nations" or "all nations except the United States." It occurs to me with great force, if this was the intention, why did not the framers of the treaty say, "all other nations" or "all nations except the United States"? They say that we have a right to exempt our ships of commerce from the payment of toll because the section says that the canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, and if we do not have the right to exempt ships of commerce from tolls then we do not have a right to exempt our ships of war from tolls. This does not seem to me to be well founded, because it is immaterial whether we exempt our ships of war from tolls or not, because we own the canal and we own our ships of war and to charge toll on our ships of war would be simply taking money from one of our pockets and putting it into another.

It is argued that the rules laid down in article 3 as a basis of neutralization do not apply to the United States. Sections 2, 3, 4, and 5 provide regulations as to the use of this canal in time of war. It is asserted by the United States and admitted by England that in case of war between the United States and Great Britain, or between the United States and any other nation, the United States would have a right as an incident of war and self-defense to prevent the other belligerent from using the canal, and thus defend our national existence by any means necessary. It is argued that since these rules regulating ships of war are not to be observed by the United States, then the United States is not bound by or included in section 1 which provides that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules. It does not seem to me that this conclusion follows.

Admitting that the United States is not bound by some of these rules because by the very nature of the situation they are inapplicable to the United States, it does not follow that the United States is not intended to be bound by the rules which are applicable to the United States. The fact, then, that by the passage of this bill we admit that we have no right to discriminate in favor of our ships of commerce in the use of this canal does not argue that in time of war we can not use this canal in any manner we see fit to protect our honor and our existence.

Nor is the effect or meaning of this disputed section, or any other section of this treaty, altered by the fact that after the signing of this treaty we acquired the ownership and sovereignty of the Canal Zone, because article 4 provides:

> It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

I am convinced that the simple, ordinary, and straightforward interpretation of this section is the one that should be adopted, and that interpretation can be best expressed in the very language of the article itself, which says: "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war to all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality." It seems to me that the natural meaning of this clause prevents the exemption from tolls of coastwise ships of the United States. Any other meaning must come as the result of circumlocution, as the result of technical refinement and strained construction. The passage of this bill means the adoption by the United States of this plain, simple, and ordinary meaning of a solemn treaty. And this does not mean, as some have tauntingly alleged, the outwitting of the present State Department by British diplomats. If we have been bested in the contest of diplomacy it has not been in the field of interpretation.

If we have been outwitted, which I deny, it occurred when the representatives of this Government acquiesced in a treaty which requires only two pages in the writing, but requires volumes for the interpretation which the opponents of this bill seek to give it. This is not, as some have said, a truckling to Great Britain or a yielding to foreign pressure. Those who have clamored loudest for the assertion of American manhood should have made themselves heard at the time when the treaty of 1901 superseded the treaty of 1850. They should have said then to Great Britain, "We do not care what you desire, we do not care what your intentions are, we do not care for your moral support and your consent, we are going to build this canal; we are going to build it on our own territory, and we are going to do with it as we please, without the consent of any nation on earth." Then, and not now, was the time for the display of this independence and courage.

No, gentlemen, when we pass this bill we adopt the plain and simple and ordinary meaning of the treaty, and this is not an American surrender. If there has been a surrender that surrender occurred in 1901, when the treaty was signed. It did not occur on the 5th day of March, 1914, when the President of the United States came before Congress and upon his solemn responsibility as the head of this Nation said, "We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

[Mr. FOWLER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to present to the Members of this House and to the country what seem to me conclusive reasons for my vote to repeal the free-tolls clause of the Panama bill. As to the frequent charge that to vote for such repeal violates the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore, I have this to say:

THE BALTIMORE PLATFORM.

The Baltimore platform on this question contradicts itself. In one section, under the heading "Democratic Congress," it says:

It is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives of the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action, and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents.

Now, that Democratic Congress had voted upon this very question on the 23d day of May, 1912, and had voted against the exemption of our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls at the canal when that exemption was proposed in what is known as the Doremus amendment. In that vote the Democrats voted, by 20 majority, against the Doremus amendment, and at the same time a considerable number of Democrats, myself among the number, were paired against the amendment. The amendment was put upon the Panama bill by a minority of Democrats and a large majority of Republicans. At the time of the Baltimore convention the Senate had not acted or taken a vote on the question. The only action the Democratic Congress had taken was as I have just stated.

The Baltimore convention showed in every way its earnest desire to indorse the action of the Democrats of the House, of which the convention and the whole country were justly proud. That convention had no dream of putting a plank in the platform which condemned the Democrats of the House, and although I have talked with many members of the convention, and with some of the members of the platform committee who were induced to put the free-tolls plank in our platform, not one of them has ever stated that when they did it they understood it was against the Democratic vote of the House. It was a situation in which the convention was easily and adroitly led astray.

SPECIAL INTERESTS.

Special interests never sleep. They had made a hard struggle in the House. They had won by the help of Republicans against Democrats. The fight was on a minor feature, apparently, of the Panama Canal bill. The ship-subsidy people, in combination with the seacoast cities, by the aid of Republicans, had won an advantage in the Doremus amendment which was covered up in the voluminous provisions of the Panama bill. Democrats over the country generally had not paid much attention to the matter. Only three hours' debate was given it in the House, but the interests saw their opportunity to nail down their advantage by getting it into the Baltimore platform, and they deftly secured its insertion there by presenting it under circumstances in which it was little, if at all, discussed, even in the committee on platform, and when the convention was uninformed of the true standing of the Democrats of the House upon it. It was done without one word of discussion in open convention, and so the convention, intending to indorse in terms of highest praise and without stint or qualification the action of the Democrats of the House, was led into doing in this matter just the opposite.

FREE-TOLLS PLANK NOT SENTIMENT OF CONVENTION.

But that is not all. It is further shown that this plank was not expressive of the sentiments of the Baltimore convention because with this free-tolls clause and in the very same section of the platform, under the head of "Merchant marine," that convention declares:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Now, with this clause and with the plank indorsing the action of the Democratic House, the subsequent clause indorsing free tolls to our coastwise vessels is in absolute, direct, and irreconcilable conflict, because the grant of free tolls to these vessels is a vast subsidy, imposing great additional burdens upon the people every year, and it is a subsidy granted to a special interest, a notorious combination which has destroyed all domestic competition and which is already by law completely protected against foreign competition. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, since I can not stand on all three of these utterances of the platform, I must stand for that principle which my own sense of honor and right and party fealty dictates. But there is another question connected with the platform.

OUR TREATY OBLIGATION.

What, Mr. Speaker, were our obligations under the treaty with Great Britain, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? I believe that if our platform had been not self-contradictory, had been unequivocal, had been in consonance with our time-honored principles, still, if it had attempted to bind us to a course or policy violative of our treaty agreements, we could not be bound by it. Both our Speaker and our floor leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, have charged in substance that, in voting for the Sims bill—the bill to repeal the free-tolls clause of the Panama bill—Democrats will be breaking faith with the American people, violating their solemn pledges, and so laying themselves liable to the same charge we so earnestly made against the Republicans in our campaign of 1912, and will be truckling and surrendering to Great Britain. The speeches and utterances of our two great leaders will be circulated by the millions by Republicans in the coming campaign. Every Democrat in a doubtful district will have to meet them. I want to suggest to them that in meeting these charges they use the following sentences from the speech of Speaker CLARK himself, the very same speech which these Republicans will circulate. After a great many utterances about party faith and party pledges and about our alleged shameful surrender to Great Britain, Mr. CLARK says:

A second reason for the repeal assigned by President Wilson is that the exemption of our coastwise trade from payment of tolls is "in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901." Of course, the President believed that or he would not have said it; but he was mistaken. If I believed that, I would vote with him, for I am as tender and zealous of my country's honor as he is, or as any other living man is. He [the President] is convinced that the statute as it now stands does contravene our solemn obligation and should therefore be repealed. So believing, he does the only thing that an honorable and conscientious head of the Nation could do—he asks us to reconsider our action. Whatever may be the differences of opinion respecting the merits of the case, I do President Wilson honor for his act.

And so the Speaker applauds the President!

Whatever wound, therefore, the speech of the Speaker may inflict upon the party, the same speech carries with it also the healing for the wound, for by that speech he simply says, when you boil it all down, that he differs from the President in judgment, but that all of us who agree with the President in judgment not only ought, but are in honor bound, to vote for the repeal of the tolls-exemption law. I am one of those who believe very strongly in the binding force of platform pledges, but, under all the facts and circumstances I have stated, party fealty and personal honor bid me with one voice to vote for the repeal, since I not only believe that free tolls to our coastwise vessels violates our Democratic platform and principles and is wrong economically and politically, but also that it violates our treaty agreements and the declarations we uniformly made publicly and officially to the world when we were arranging for and building the canal, and for 70 years before that time.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY AND OUR UNIFORM DECLARATIONS.

On this point a historical review of the whole question will aid us, if aid is necessary, in giving a true interpretation of the treaty. In about 1784 Great Britain acquired British Honduras, and later she acquired a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast and over the Bay Islands, a group near Honduras. Those possessions were deemed by the statesmanship of that time and for nearly a century afterwards to give Great Britain the privilege of building a canal across the Isthmus. The United States began to feel that it would be hurtful to her interests if Great Britain did so, and negotiations were begun by us looking to equal partnership and control of such a canal by Great Britain and the United States. The gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE, has referred to the correspondence of Mr. Clay as Secretary of State with Great Britain on the subject, in which he undertook to secure cooperation between the United States and that country in building the canal on terms that would hold it "equally open to the commerce of both nations and of the world." This was Henry Clay, whose Americanism is so praised by the Speaker. Later, in 1835, the United States Senate adopted the following resolution:

For * * * the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and securing by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations.

The House in 1839 adopted unanimously a resolution—

* * * For the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of affecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever by suitable treaty stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations.

In furtherance of that project a treaty with New Granada was negotiated by us in 1846, of which President Polk in his message to Congress said:

It will constitute no alliance for any political object but for a purely commercial purpose in which all the navigating nations of the world have a common interest * * *. The ultimate object as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution of March 3, 1835, to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus.

Following this the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 was negotiated. Nothing was done under that treaty to build the canal. Later, under President Grant, I believe, Secretary of State Fish in his negotiations declared:

We shall * * * be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practical route and the early commencement and completion of an interoceanic communication, which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations without advantages to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality * * *.

Later still, in Mr. Garfield's administration, Secretary Blaine's instructions to our minister at London, Mr. Lowell, declared:

Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations, for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe.

To which Lord Granville for England replied:

Such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American Continent, but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she (Great Britain) would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use.

Following this, in 1885, President Cleveland's message to Congress reads:

Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two great maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit * * *. These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambition and warlike necessities of none.

Remember the Clayton-Bulwer treaty then stood.

In 1896 Secretary of State Olney's memorandum reads:

The interoceanic routes there specified should under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them be neutral and free to all nations alike * * * The United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty (Clayton-Bulwer) is in full force and vigor.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we could not have fortified the canal, and for that reason mainly we secured the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

These were the sentiments and declarations officially made by the United States leading up to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1901. They led to the absolute acquiescence of all nations in our acquisition of the Canal Zone. No nation questioned our purpose or saw in our action any desire, so far as the commerce of the world was concerned, to obtain in any manner any advantage over the commerce of any other nation, and in January, 1904, still breathing the spirit and the honesty of all our prior declarations, President Roosevelt, in his special message of January 4, declares:

Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was explicitly provided that the United States should control, police, and protect the canal which was to be built, keeping it open for the vessels of all nations on equal terms.

Secretary Hay's note of January 5, 1904, reads:

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was conceived to form an obstacle and the British Government therefore agreed to abrogate it, the United States only promising in return to protect the canal and keep it open on equal terms to all nations in accordance with our traditional policy.

To go back a little, in submitting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate in 1901, the Secretary of State, John Hay, submitted, also, a confidential memorandum, which was quite lengthy, but, among other things, contained these clauses:

(1) With this is submitted the new treaty, which declares the neutrality of canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality.

(2) The United States alone adopts the rule as a basis for neutralization, and adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing its absolute neutrality without the assistance of Great Britain or any other nation.

(3) It was considered that war between the contracting parties, or between the United States and any other power, would have the ordinary effect when not specifically otherwise provided and remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and protect and defend it by whatever means might be necessary.

(4) The whole theory of the treaty is that it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances it was thought fair to omit prohibition of fortification.

Secretary Hay further says to the Senate previous to the ratification of the treaty—

That Great Britain by this treaty surrendered important national interests, and as a consideration for which, and in further carrying out the historic and unvarying policy of our country, we place in this treaty beyond dispute the general principles of neutralization and equality.

Senator Davis, chairman of the committee, in his report to the Senate upon this Hay-Pauncefote treaty entirely supports the position of Secretary Hay.

OTHER TREATIES.

Besides negotiations with Great Britain the United States made and attempted to make many treaties with various Latin-American nations with reference to the construction of an interoceanic canal. One with New Granada in 1848; one with Colombia in 1869; others in 1870, in 1873, and in 1881, all containing provisions for free and equal right of passage to all nations. One with Honduras in 1864; one with Nicaragua in 1849, another in 1867, another in 1869, and another in 1877, all containing provisions for all vessels on equal terms in every respect as between each other. There was a treaty of the United States with Nicaragua in December, 1884, with a provision couched in different terms. It provided for equal tolls for the vessels of all nations, excepting the vessels of the contracting parties engaged in the coastwise trade. It is important to notice this treaty because of the exception it contains and because the terms used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the other treaties which I have mentioned contain no such exception. It is the general rule of construction that any exception to a general provision intended to be made must be expressly noted, nor has this rule ever been questioned until the present controversy. The terms of the Suez convention, under which the Suez Canal was dug, in like manner expressly reserved special rights of Turkey, and under that convention and the administration of the canal, which is under the control of Great Britain, all nations other than Turkey have had to pay precisely the same tolls and observe the same rules. It would seem that further argument was unnecessary, still I will add one more circumstance. With the history of our negotiations such as I have related it, with the mind of the world fixed in its understanding of our purpose to build the canal and open it on terms of absolute equality to the ships and commerce and citizens of all nations, our own included, with that understanding soundly based on the utterances of our diplomatic representatives, our ministers, Secretaries of State, and Presidents, and of the House of Representatives and Senate in resolutions adopted by them, is it strange that the terms and meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are not debated outside of the United States, as the President has told us they are not? Still there is one further circumstance.

VOTE ON BARD AMENDMENT IN SENATE.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was submitted to the Senate for ratification, Senator Bard, of California, moved to amend it by excepting from its provisions for equality our vessels engaged in coastwise trade; that is, to make the same exception that was made in our Nicaragua treaty of 1884. This amendment was voted down by a vote of 46 to 23 and the treaty ratified as it stands, providing as broadly as possible that—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination in respect of the condition or charges of traffic or otherwise.

CATCHING AT STRAWS.

Free-toll advocates, catching at every straw, try to find some consolation in the argument that this provision refers to war vessels as well as vessels of commerce, and that if we require vessels of commerce belonging to citizens of the United States to pay equal tolls with those belonging to other nations or citizens, we must likewise charge tolls to the war vessels of the United States. The argument is too absurd for serious men to weigh, for the reason that to require the United States, the actual owner of the vessel, to pay to the United States, the actual owner of the canal, any sum of money for any purpose would be ridiculous; and the other consolation argument, self-deluding argument, that these men make is that by applying the clause I have quoted to the United States we would thereby be precluded from holding or defending the canal against an enemy. That argument is answered by the express terms of the treaty and by the third and succeeding clauses of the memorandum of Secretary Hay, which I have quoted.

The pretended fear that by now doing justice and keeping our plighted faith as to commerce we shall destroy or diminish our sovereignty or political control or right to fortify and hold and defend the Canal Zone is only pretended fear, because these gentlemen know that, without protest or objection from any part or nation of the world, we have fortified the canal, and that, so far as the interest of this Nation is concerned in a military sense, no one questions our absolute and unqualified right to use the canal for our own protection. I deal with this phase of the question briefly, because there is no sincerity in the pretense. It is like a great deal of the talk about our truckling or surrendering to Great Britain.

CLAIM THAT WE WERE GUILTY OF SHARP PRACTICE.

There is another contention of the advocates of free tolls. It is that when the Senate of the United States, before ratifying the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, voted down the amendment proposed by Senator Bard, which would have authorized us, had it been adopted, to have exempted our coastwise vessels from paying tolls, they did so with a mental reservation or with the belief that we had that right without the amendment, and the minority here to-day have presented us with statements of some five or six Senators who say that Senators voted that way because they believed the amendment was unnecessary. Now we have absolute knowledge that had the Senate adopted that amendment Great Britain would have declined to consummate the treaty. I do not doubt the Senate at the time knew it also. I think any reasonable man, looking over the history of our diplomatic negotiations either then or now, will know that to be the case. It is inconceivable that any considerable number of Senators, with this history before them, would have voted against the Bard amendment on any other than one of two grounds: First, that they did not desire the amendment, or, second, that they would not endanger the treaty, which we were anxious to consummate, by adopting the amendment. It must be borne in mind that the Senate only discusses treaties in executive session, so there are no debates to look to for the views of Senators on this question.

Some few Senators may then have believed that without any amendment to the treaty the United States would have the right to prefer vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade, but I think such Senators were few, and I would venture the opinion that if you could now go back 13 years and search the mind of the Senate at the time of its action on this treaty you would find that practically all the Senators who thought so voted for the Bard amendment. Certainly they knew our claim of such right would be questioned, if for no other reason, for the simple one that we had raised the same question under a similar treaty with Great Britain in regard to our citizens having the right to an equal use of the Canadian Welland Canal on the Great Lakes. It is unthinkable, to my mind, that honorable Senators would have voted against this amendment with the secret purpose in their mind to claim the right expressed in it without putting that right to the test of negotiation by inserting it in the treaty and submitting it to Great Britain. Critics of England have sometimes called her "perfidious Albion." How well the epithet may be deserved I shall not say; but if we avail ourselves of such a mental reservation as is now alleged to have existed in the minds of Senators when they voted to ratify the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, such a secret purpose as it is now claimed they had to interpret the treaty contrary to what they knew was the understanding of Great Britain, then I will say that hereafter the critic of the United States may well give us the hateful epithet of "perfidious Columbia." We held out to the world one thing; we intended another. We said we were building the canal for the use of the commerce of all nations on equal terms; we intended it for the special advantage of our own. We mentally reserved the privilege of giving our own citizens, or, as we have done, of giving a special class of our citizens, a special benefit and advantage over the citizens and commerce of other nations. If we do this, gentlemen, we earn for ourselves the odium of the world.

CLAIM IT IS NO DISCRIMINATION TO EXEMPT COASTWISE VESSELS.

But, say the free-toll advocates, our laws exclude the vessels of all other nations from our coastwise trade, and therefore it is no discrimination for us to give our vessels in that trade exemption from tolls. Such a claim, under existing facts, is hollow and discreditable. They cite a certain Supreme Court decision involving pilotage charges against a foreign vessel entering Galveston, Tex. I will not go into that case. To do so would require too much time; but the issues in that case involved no real discrimination against the trade or commerce of the nation owning the foreign vessel, nor were the terms of the treaty involved equivalent to the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. But I go further, and say that whatever may have been any decision made in any other case, however close an analogy may be drawn between the issues involved in that case and the questions here and now involved, still, if the facts involved in this question, the history of the treaty, the preceding and contemporaneous negotiations and declarations concerning it, as to its purposes and meaning and the terms of the treaty, all show, as they do, and that clearly, what its meaning is, as an honorable nation we have no other alternative except to observe its real and substantial meaning. To my mind the words of the treaty are plain English; nothing is said about exempting our coastwise vessels. Under those words we would have just as much right and just as little right to exempt our vessels engaged in foreign trade—if, as a matter of fact, the exemption of our coastwise vessels from tolls works any real or substantial disadvantage—as against the vessels of commerce of any other nation. As to that question, let me try to show how such an exemption would so operate. The western part of Canada is supplied with magnificent forests—a great storehouse of wealth. The Canadian is naturally seeking a market for his lumber and timber. Likewise, the western portion of the United States is clothed with great forests. The lumber of Canada and of Washington, Oregon, and California is in sharp competition. Now, the Democratic Party have—especially since the campaign of 1908—been earnest in seeking to give this Canadian lumber free entry into the United States.

We fought hard to remove all the tariff from it when the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed, and finally when the Underwood bill was passed we got the tariff on Canadian lumber taken off, intending thereby that lumber from Canada might compete in the United States with Washington, Oregon, and California lumber. If two vessels, one from Canada and one from California, make the voyage, as they now have to do around Cape Horn, they get to our eastern coast on exactly equal terms, and the lumber of Canada competes fairly with the lumber of California, but when our canal is open, if the vessel from San Francisco goes through the canal paying no tolls, while the lumber from British Columbia goes through the same canal paying $1.20 per ton, the effect would be precisely the same as if we had put back the tariff on British lumber for the protection of the lumber barons of the great Pacific States. Now, who would profit by this exemption or protection? Certainly not the people. The Pacific slope forests are, in the main, owned by great corporations, and these corporations combine to fix the price of lumber to the people of the United States. The Southern Pacific Railway and the Weyerhaeusers together own such vast regions that their wealth is beyond computation. I am not going into that matter, however. I am only using it for the purpose of showing that by charging tolls to the coastwise vessels of Canada and exempting our own, we are discriminating in a real and substantial way against the commerce of Canada, and incidentally that our people would suffer and that only big interests would benefit. I could give a thousand illustrations to the same effect. The truth is there is as much discrimination against the commerce of other nations in exempting coastwise vessels as there would be in exempting American vessels in our foreign trade, and if we have a right to exempt our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls we also have the right to exempt our vessels engaged in foreign trade.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], frank as he always is, declares that such is the case, and evidently he believes that we ought to exempt our foreign-going vessels from toll, and in all candor, if our purpose is to try to build up our foreign merchant marine, we ought to exempt the foreign-going vessel if we exempt any. Mr. UNDERWOOD and others claim that such exemption is no discrimination against the vessels or commerce of other nations. If the commerce of other nations is not in any manner affected, as the advocates of exemption claim, certainly they would have no right to complain of the exemption of either our coastwise or our foreign-going vessels. I am absolutely sure they would not complain, if that were the case. On the other hand, if such exemption either of our coastwise or our foreign-going vessels is hurtful to the commerce of any other nation and especially of Great Britain, then, under the letter and the spirit of our treaty, such nation not only might, but certainly and justly will, protest.

Mr. Speaker, I want to pause here to explain that all through this debate we speak of our vessels and foreign vessels, when we mean, in both cases, vessels owned by private parties, generally corporations, of our nation or of foreign nations.

SUBSIDIES.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is no question by anybody that I have ever heard of, and there can be no question, that the United States or Canada or any other nation may grant directly to any ship, foreign or domestic, any amount and any kind of subsidy or bounty which may be measured and determined in any manner desired by the nation granting it. Therefore the United States or any other nation whose ships go through the canal may grant out of its general treasury to any one of its ships a bounty or subsidy exactly equal to the tolls paid by the ship without any breach of any kind of faith or any cause of any kind of offense toward any other nation. For the United States to do this with reference to the ships of her citizens, either in the coastwise or foreign trade, would be to accomplish precisely the same result as if she charged them no toll. In one sense it would be doing indirectly what free tolls would do directly. In another sense it would be doing directly what free tolls would do indirectly. Paying the bounty would be giving free tolls indirectly. Giving free tolls would be paying a bounty indirectly. The difference between the two methods of conferring the same benefit would be that to collect the tolls and pay out the bounty would cost something in bookkeeping and handling the money, and perhaps cause the shipowner to pay interest or lay out of the use of his money between the time when he paid it out as tolls and the time when it was paid back to him as bounty. Save this difference the benefits bestowed on the shipping interests and the burdens borne by the Government—that is, the whole people—would be precisely the same in the two cases. Why, then, Mr. Speaker, if we are so anxious to bear this burden and bestow this great benefit or bounty or subsidy upon our coastwise shipping industry, do not we do it by direct bounty? Why not go down into Uncle Sam's pocket like men and pull out the people's money and give it to this Shipping Trust and so save our faith and our face? I will tell you why. We would rather face the criticism of the outside world, who so largely and sincerely believe we have broken faith; we would rather lose their trust; we would rather live under a cloud in the eyes of many honest men who read a plain meaning in plain words, than face the American people with the story that we gave their hard-wrung tax money to the giant ship combination, which all men know has absorbed our whole coastwise trade and crushed out all competition and now wrings from that trade the last dollar the traffic will bear. We do not pursue the open course, because if we did the American people would know we were paying millions annually and without any excuse as a ship subsidy. We do not pursue the open course, because special favor always works by indirection and concealment and loves darkness rather than light; because the people will bear indirect burdens we do not dare to place on them directly; will pay hidden tribute that no man would dare propose openly. By free tolls the shipping combination get the same benefit, the same bounty, the same tribute, but it does not appear on the books. There are no books.

Our adversaries, not daring to advocate or defend direct subsidies to our coastwise ships, are none the less quick to urge our right to grant subsidies as an argument in defense of our exemption of certain ships from payment of tolls.

"We may grant," say they, "a subsidy equal to tolls. Why may we not give an exemption which is only equal to the subsidy?" This, to my mind, is the only question which was not completely answered the other day by the great speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. He argued that the difference between the payment of a bounty directly to the vessel, citizen, or traffic from the Public Treasury and the remission of tolls to a particular class as an act of favoritism arose from the fact that "each nation can regulate its own policy as to the former method, while as to the latter the public action would be entirely within the power of one nation." He did not pursue the argument; and that line of argument, which was the same line pursued by us in our controversy with Canada when she discriminated against us as to the Welland Canal, did not satisfy me, though it did satisfy our Congress and our President at that time. To my mind the real distinction between the right to grant a bounty and the right to grant a discriminating exemption must be found in a profound knowledge and appreciation of the limitations and weakness of human nature. The real reason seems to me this: The canal, outside of its military features, is a great business plant or venture. Its owner will seek to make it self-sustaining at least. We will be prone to figure tolls so as to bring us a profit. How much profit? Already we are cited by Mr. UNDERWOOD to the fact that the Suez Canal is made to pay a handsome dividend. The temptation, since none may say us nay, will be, after exempting vessels of our citizens from tolls, to ignore that fact in our estimate of expenses and income and we will be almost superhuman if in the end we do not make or try to make the canal pay a good dividend out of the charges we do make and collect, and so take the bounty we give some vessels out of the tolls that others pay. This right, if it exists, to remit tolls to some puts us on too easy a ground. Like all indirect methods, both its favors and its burdens are hidden. But the conclusive point against the claim that we may exempt some vessels from tolls, because we have the right to grant equivalent bounty, is that it proves too much. The claim must be denied in toto or else we must claim further that since we may, if we will, grant a subsidy to any vessel, either of the United States or of any other nation, so also we may, if we will, remit the tolls to any ship of any nation. This would enable us to use our right to exempt the vessels of any nation from canal tolls, in making all sorts of trades and treaties, and so to discriminate practically without restriction between all vessels and all nations. "A conclusion absurd in the face of our treaty," you say; true, but it absolutely follows if the right to grant a subsidy gives the right under our treaty to grant exemption from tolls. So, Mr. Speaker, the President is right. As an honest Nation let us cease quibbling and trying to beat our neighbor and stand squarely by our treaty and our honor.

Leaving now the question of our platform and of our treaty, I want to speak so plainly that every man may understand just what the real economic question is. In plain words, it is this: There are not exceeding 15 companies or corporations in the United States whose ships will use the Panama Canal in our coastwise trade. We have paid about $400,000,000 to build the canal and will pay about $40,000,000 annually to keep it up. The question, then, is, Shall we vote that every man, woman, and child in the United States be taxed, initially about $5 and annually hereafter 50 cents per capita, in order to give free tolls to the ships of these 15 corporations, or shall we require these ships to pay a just sum for being carried across the Isthmus?

CLAIM THAT FREE TOLLS CHEAPEN FREIGHT.

The advocates of this exemption from payment of tolls strongly urge that it is in the interest of the whole people by reason of its cheapening freight, and on this ground they say that it is a sound economic policy for us to dig this canal at a cost of $400,000,000 and maintain it at a cost of possibly $40,000,000 annually, and then put these ships through it free of charge to the ship and cargo owner; and they cite as argument for that position the fact that we spend millions upon millions every year to clean out and make navigable our rivers and canals and charge no tolls thereon to the vessels that use them. The trouble with this argument is that if it proves anything it proves more than they desire, to wit, that we ought to operate the canal as we do our rivers, free of tolls to all vessels trading to and from the United States, whether they belong to our Nation or to some other nation, for to relieve a foreign vessel bringing a cargo to the United States would be just as likely to reduce the freight rates charged by that vessel as would the relieving an American vessel from payment of tolls to reduce the freight rates charged by the American vessel. So if we honestly believe that the alleged cheaper freight rate justifies the remission of tolls, we ought to remit them as to all vessels trading with us and bear almost the whole burden of building, defending, maintaining, and operating the canal by taxes levied on the whole people. That is what we do as to our rivers; we charge no toll on them to either foreign or domestic vessels. The simple truth is the question of what public works the whole people will do through the taxing power and what aid the Government will give free of charge to the particular users of public utilities is always a question of wise policy, good sense, common equity, and frequently one of proportion. A county will build a fine wagon road upon which private vehicles pass free, but the same county will build, or authorize a corporation to build, which is the same thing, a costly bridge or pike road and charge tolls for passing over them. States sometimes build canals and at first charge toll, but later, when the public benefit is deemed general and broad enough, remit all charges.

The river and harbor act of 1884 was passed in the full knowledge that Congress, of course, could have imposed toll on all vessels using any of the improved waterways on which so much has since been expended, just as Germany imposes tolls on the navigation of the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal. It was passed with the knowledge that if it chose to impose such tolls, Congress must impose them on American vessels as well as foreign vessels, for the United States and all other maritime nations make no discrimination on account of the flag.

The man who argues by analogy says you have done this thing; you have constructed this and that utility and made its use free; why not do another thing? Why not construct another and vaster work and make its use free? He can plausibly argue that as you have built a canal and maintain it free, why not build a free railroad? The truth is there are many services the Government renders free to the beneficiaries of them, while there are many other like services which the Government still charges for, endeavoring to make those pay for them who specially use them and so relieve the general mass from the burden of paying for something by which they are only remotely or not at all benefited. Our rivers are free; our harbors collect dues. Our Postal Service is made nearly self-sustaining by the postage charge. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, the Panama Canal and its operation is a work too stupendous for all the people to pay for and maintain and give its use free to the special beneficiaries, our coastwise shipping, or our seacoast cities, if the ships would decrease their freight charges by the full amount of the toll, which they would not. It seems to me, therefore, that every vessel, foreign or domestic, using the canal ought to pay tolls.

I shall conclude my treatment of this phase of the question by simply asking if there is one man in all this Congress who would be willing to tax our whole people in order to permit all the vessels of the world trading with us to go through the canal free from the payment of tolls, thereby giving to our people who might pay the freight a cheaper rate? If so, let him stand up. To be consistent, if he wants one such vessel to go through free, he ought to want them all to do so.

DENOUNCING RAILWAYS.

Advocates of free tolls to our coastwise ships vehemently denounce the transcontinental railways, and strenuously insist that Jim Hill and these railroads are the scoundrels they are after; that they want cheap water transportation in order to compete with these railroads and bring down the railway freight rates. Now, I want to be frank and fair in meeting this argument. I candidly believe the railroads are interested, and selfishly interested, as I shall show, in this question. The Southern Pacific and certain other roads owning vast pine forests are interested in favor of free tolls to our coastwise ships, because it is the equivalent of a tariff duty upon lumber. Otherwise, so far as I can see, all such railroads are interested in having such vessels pay toll. All our big seacoast cities are interested in having them exempt from payment of tolls. This statement is made on the supposition that in some way, by law, the Government of the United States may be able to break up and prevent combination between the railroads and ship lines. Of course, if that combination shall continue as perfect as it is now, the railroads are not at all concerned about the tolls, unless it be in unison with ships favoring the exemption, and in that case the seacoast cities will not get the benefit from the exemption which they fondly expect. But supposing real competition between ship and rail, it is a fact that freight can be carried by ship from San Francisco to New York or from Seattle to New York for about two-thirds of the actual cost to the railroads of the transportation overland, and this when the ships are required to pay tolls at the canal. That being the case, the effect of real competition would be that all goods moving between San Francisco and New York would move by ship in preference to rail, unless they were of a character which demanded the quicker transportation. A vast quantity of products, especially of the heavier and hardier kind, as well as a great deal of the highest class of goods which require no special hurry, would certainly go by water. In addition to this, the ships will draw from inland points surrounding San Francisco and New York for a radius within which the shipper can pay the local rate to the seacoast and the water rate to the opposite seacoast town cheaper than he could pay the through rail rate from point of shipment to point of destination, and so the less the water rate shall be the wider the radius around these seacoast cities from which inland products will come to them for shipment by water, and likewise the stronger the competition the more the railroads will lose of their through freight. In this way, then, if competition between water and rail were real and earnest, the railways would be interested to increase the cost of water transportation, and naturally in favor of levying tolls upon the vessels competing with them through the canal; and of course San Francisco and New York are both interested in widening the radius, increasing the distance inland from which they will draw shipments that might otherwise pass over the railroad without coming to them or through them. The effect of this is unquestionably to favor and help build up the seacoast cities at the expense of the inland cities, and very naturally the seacoast cities all favor free tolls, because they believe that, whatever else results, they will be benefited thereby.

But, Mr. Speaker, here are two transportation agencies. Why should the Government spend money in order to help one of these agencies, and, especially, why should the Government help that agency which naturally has the advantage, and why should the Government tax the people of the interior in order to build up the cities of the seacoast? The Government has by building the canal, if she charges a reasonable toll for its use, enabled the water carrier who now goes around Cape Horn to cut off 8,000 miles from his voyage in going from San Francisco to New York; and now we are confronted by the demand of this carrier that we do more—that we lift his vessel up, place her in our canal, float her through its high reaches, then lower her down again to the sea on the other side, operating all our locks and dams, keeping them in order and defended by our military for the purpose, and that we do all this free of charge. And then they tell us that they ask this in order to enable this vessel to compete with the railroads. I know it is popular to jump on the railroads, and that has been a large part of the stock in trade of the advocates of free tolls, but when I see the supporters of one special interest denouncing another special interest I want to look before I leap. I want to see if there is a special selfish motive behind the denunciation.

MORE ABOUT SUBSIDY.

Our opponents sometimes deny that they are asking for a ship subsidy, but the franker ones admit that it is a subsidy, and try to justify it on the ground that they are doing it to build up our merchant marine and for the glory of our flag on the seas. As to whether it is a subsidy, in addition to what I have already said, I want to add this extract from a letter of Secretary of State Knox, one of the strong advocates of free tolls, to Erwin B. Laughlin, Esq., American chargé d'affaires at London. The letter is dated "Department of State, Washington, January 17, 1913." The extract reads as follows:

The exemption of coastwise trade from tolls or the refunding of tolls collected from the coastwise trade is merely a subsidy granted by the United States to that trade, and the loss resulting from not collecting or from refunding those tolls will fall solely upon the United States.

I do not believe any man not blinded by self-interest will deny that the exemption is a subsidy. Mr. Speaker, the very first time I entered the doors of Congress after my election as a Member to it, when I came here before I took my seat and witnessed the closing scenes of the Fifty-ninth Congress, I found the ship-subsidy advocates knocking at our doors. They called it then a subvention; they called it mail pay—ocean mail pay. They wanted so many dollars per mile per voyage, but they were afraid to confess to the word "subsidy"; they were loudly singing the praises of our glorious flag and they were fiercely twisting the British lion's tail, but I saw then and I see now that they had a double twist. The same hand that held the lion's tail held also the bottom end of Uncle Sam's pocket, and every time that hand would make a twist on the tail it took a twist on the pocket also, and the twister, while listening to the imaginary lion's roar, was looking for the pocket to belch real dollars into the till of the American shipowner. That bill, by shrewd management, after being once defeated, finally passed the House by a slender majority, notwithstanding almost every Democratic vote was against it. It went over to the Senate and was there talked to death by the lamented Carmack. At the next term of Congress the Democrats were stronger than they were in the Fifty-ninth, and the subsidy people were unable to pass their bill in the House.

But Democrats opposing ship subsidy then had to fight the same newspapers, in the main, pandering to the ship interest that we are fighting to-day on the question of free tolls to privately owned ships using the canal and on discriminating duties. We had to fight the same big city influence that we must fight to-day. The same methods were used. The British lion's tail was twisted. We were charged with surrendering American commerce to Great Britain and with being influenced by a foreign lobby, while subsidy—subvention, as they called it—was held up as a compound of piety, patriotism, and Americanism.

In the Sixty-first Congress the Democrats were still stronger. In the Sixty-second Congress they had a majority in the House, and the advocates of the subsidy graft bade it a long, sad, fond farewell, and then they turned their attention to another form of favor called discriminating dues and duties.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Discriminating duties is the same thing under another name. It had better and fairer associations and memories. It is better fitted to deceive; in fact, it has caught some of our otherwise good Democrats in its meshes and we hear even from some Democrats the false statement that discriminating duties and tonnage dues is good sound Democratic doctrine. They quote garbled sentences and paragraphs from Jefferson and Madison, and point to statutes passed under the administrations of these and other Presidents. One happy result of this great debate will be to clear the atmosphere, to refute these misstatements, and to set history right.

SETTING HISTORY RIGHT.

The truth is that immediately after the American Revolution the thirteen original States were practically separate unconnected sovereignties. They had no means of acting together for their common good. Great Britain then, as now, the leading maritime and merchant nation of the world, quickly turned our weakness to her advantage in a day and time when every nation sought its own prosperity by trying to destroy the prosperity of others. She put in operation discriminating duties and tonnage dues against our ships, or the ships of our different States. The several States could not retaliate, for the reason that although England made the ships from any of our States pay vastly heavier tonnage dues than her own ships when they entered her ports, and imposed heavier duties on goods when shipped to British ports in American bottoms than when shipped in British, nevertheless the States could not help themselves, because they could not act in unison. If Massachusetts imposed retaliatory burdens upon British shipping, and New York did not, the result was that British ships traded with the port of New York and the port of Boston suffered. If any State imposed burdens on British vessels heavier than the burdens imposed by some other State, it was soon found that the State imposing the heavier burden suffered. Other nations followed the example of Great Britain. This condition continued until after the adoption of our present Constitution, when we at once under Washington adopted laws retaliating against Great Britain and other nations by imposing discriminating duties similar to their own, and this policy was continued by us more or less down to Jackson's time, in 1829 or 1830. It was continued, however, by the United States always under protest and under declarations of our greatest Democrats, including Thomas Jefferson, to the effect that all the United States desired was absolute freedom of the seas and free and equal commerce with all nations. Almost immediately after the adoption of the retaliatory measures bills began to be introduced providing for the reciprocal repeal of them between the United States and other nations, but no action was taken, because we had hardly passed our first law providing for discriminating duties before all Europe became involved in the wars of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, and our shipping prospered greatly because of European conditions. At the latter end of these wars the treatment of our vessels brought on our War of 1812 with Great Britain, which was closed in 1814. In 1815 we passed an act of Congress providing substantially for the repeal of our discriminating tonnage dues and duties as to the vessels of any nation which would adopt a like liberal policy toward us. That act was adopted by Congress practically without division and was only amended to extend its liberality, until the administration of Andrew Jackson, by whom the last vestige of the policy of discriminating duties was through congressional act and international treaties swept out of existence; but I can tell this story better in the language of the debates in Congress during the sessions of 1826, 1827, and 1828.

In January, 1826, the whole subject was exhaustively debated in Congress. At that time Mr. John Quincy Adams was President; the great Mr. Clay, I believe, was Secretary of State. The Department of State had been for quite a while endeavoring, through negotiations with Great Britain, to secure a reciprocal treaty under which the ports of the British West Indies would be open on fair and equal terms to vessels of the United States. In 1825 the British Parliament had passed an act granting equality to our ships in those ports, provided we would grant the same equality in our ports to British vessels from the West Indies. Instead of acting at once through Congress, the State Department took up the matter, apparently very earnestly anxious to consummate a treaty along the lines of the British parliamentary action, but the administration, as I gather, sought to bring other questions into the negotiations. They insisted that not only should our vessels trading to these West Indian ports be placed on an equal footing with British vessels, but also that our goods carried there should be burdened with no higher tariff dues than the goods from Great Britain. Upon that question Great Britain was firm, insisting that her own goods going to her own colonies should have preferential rates as against the products of the United States. Our representative sent to Great Britain got sick, failed to present his credentials for a long time, and the negotiations were delayed from one cause and another, and much criticism of the delay was indulged in by Members of Congress. Meantime, since the United States apparently did not respond to the overtures of Great Britain, they were withdrawn, and the British West Indian ports were absolutely closed to our vessels. Under these conditions the bill under discussion in January, 1826, as shown in volume 2, part 1, page 70, of the debates of Congress for that year, was introduced and discussed. The report of debates at that time is in narrative form largely. They are not so full as our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is to-day. Mr. Lloyd, of Massachusetts, said the "object of the bill was to offer all foreign nations entire equality of intercourse as to ships, complete removal of discriminating duties," which, he said, "were coevil with the Government." He continued:

> Before our Federal Government had hardly recovered from exhaustive war and had no head to protect our rights, alien duties were laid on our navigation which we had no power to retaliate. For one State to try it only drove her trade to ports of other States. General Government, as soon as formed, stepped in with retaliatory discriminating duties. The effect at first seemed electrical. In 1789 our whole tonnage in foreign commerce was 234,000 tons, of which more than 100,000 tons was in foreign ships. In 17 or 18 years our foreign trade increased to 1,200,000 tons, of which only 86,000 tons was in foreign ships.

But he does not contend that this was exclusively or even mainly due to discriminating duties. He says it arose from other and more powerful causes—political events of the time, wars of the French Revolution, continued for 20 years, affecting all navigating States of Europe, and "sweeping all their ships from the sea." These, he says, constitute the first two eras, one before and one after discriminating duties were applied, but he says they do not test the operation of discriminating duties. The next period he declares does so. He says the British War closed by the treaty of Ghent in December, 1814, just after the peace of Europe, by the treaty of Paris, and nations resumed their normal position, each "cultivating its own resources to the extent of its ability."

> At once the United States, acting in conformity with our uniform principles as declared in the message of the late President (Madison) and in our first commercial treaty—that with France—passed in March, 1815, the act reciprocally repealing discriminating duties, and in July, 1815, we entered a reciprocal convention with Great Britain.

This convention was only partial, not covering our trade with British West Indies, Canada, and so forth.

> American shipowners grew alarmed, fearing that if British vessels might come into our ports on equal terms with ours they would destroy our navigation. The British also thought they could beat us, because, while our ships cost about the same, their oak was better and their ships would outlast ours, and in times of peace our seamen were paid one-third to one-half more than theirs.

This was about the same argument that we hear so much of now from those who continually demand subsidies and favors for our shipping interests; but Mr. Lloyd continues:

> The contest was then fairly on. The result was that before the end of 12 months it was perceived the American ship would perform nearly three trips to the other's two, and that goods shipped by the former would be received more frequently and enable the importers the better to supply the market than by British ships, the consequence of which was the latter quitted the trade, and we have now the whole of it in American vessels.

I condense and only quote in substance part of his speech. This, he said, was to his mind conclusive, and this was the period when the first suspension of the discriminating duties had taken place. He would trace further the act of Congress of 1815. The convention with Great Britain was for four years. In 1818 it was renewed for 10 years and is now in existence. In that year a treaty was also formed with Sweden embracing the same provision and for the same period. This principle has been still further extended by diplomatic arrangements with Russia, Prussia, Norway, Oldenberg, the Hanse Towns, France, and Sardinia. Negotiations, it is understood, are pending in relation to it with some other of the powers of Europe and the States of South America, and will probably issue in the same result.

This, then, is the period 1815 to 1824, and the principal one on which a correct estimation may be formed of the effect of the discriminating duties. It was a time of peace. In 1816 the whole amount of tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States was 1,300,000, of which 258,000 were in foreign navigation. I now quote literally:

Had this quantity of foreign navigation increased in 1824, when the tonnage duty had been taken off from the vessels of nearly all the navigating powers of Europe? Let the same record answer. The amount of tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States in 1824, the latest to which we have returns, had fallen off, owing to the causes before mentioned, but it amounted to 935,000 tons. What proportion had foreign shipowners of this when relieved from the tonnage duties? Not nearly one-half, as in 1789; not more than one-fifth, or 258,000 tons, as in 1816. No, sir; they had not a tithe, a tenth part, having only 89,000 out of 935,000; and this is decisive; it shows that on a fair field and a clear stage your merchants and navigators, on equal terms, are able successfully to compete with any nation on the face of the earth, with or without discriminating duties.

He concluded:

The committee is unanimous for the bill.

I have given the argument of Mr. Lloyd because it was very forceful, and I will add that it was not then controverted by any Member of the Senate who heard it. The only controversy that arose was as to whether Congress should act or leave the matter for negotiation by treaty with the President, so nothing was done at that time. In April, 1826, the subject was again discussed, like sentiments were again expressed, and again nothing was done. In February, 1827 (see debates of Feb. 21, 1827, vol. 3, p. 398), the discussion was on a bill to close the ports of the United States to vessels of British colonies and possessions, including the West Indies, Canada, Bahama, and so forth, and forfeiting vessels violating the same; also prohibiting exports from the United States to those colonies and possessions, but respecting our treaties with Great Britain of 1815 and 1818, but providing that the act be void if Britain opens her colonial ports to ships of the United States at no higher charges than are made against British vessels from the United States, and so forth.

Mr. Branch, of North Carolina, said:

The subject was of vast importance, and there was no difference of opinion on it.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, said:

The subject was of great importance, and it was urgent. That British orders in council had cut off our trade with the colonies.

Mr. Hayne of South Carolina, Mr. Johnson of Louisiana, and Mr. Johnson of Kentucky urged the importance of the bill. This bill, subject to the conditions of reciprocity, repealed all restrictive parts of our acts of 1818, 1820, and 1823, all of which were retaliating the discriminations against us of other nations, and it puts British vessels on the same footing as our own.

Mr. Smith said:

We ask no advantage. We had a chance to have had the trade on the terms now proposed, by the act of July 5, 1825, of Great Britain; but we did not meet her with frankness, and hence her order in council of July 27, 1826.

You will observe that he, as did others, criticized the administration for its delay and failure in negotiating with Great Britain. He then gives briefly the history and operation of our discriminating duties.

The first law—

He says—

put a duty of 94 cents per ton and 10 per cent added tariff duties on foreign vessels and goods imported in them. The consequence—was a rapid increase of our navigation, and in two or three years we had vessels sufficient to carry all our imports and exports.

He says—

Thereupon—

He says—

the British Parliament were alarmed, appointed a committee, and sought to parry the blow—and then they began to devise new discriminations against us, which—gave to her the carrying of all our cotton and tobacco to her colonies, and for the consumption of Great Britain and her commerce.

He says—

Thus we see what we then ran into.

But—

Says Mr. Smith—

England was at war, and could not make her retaliation fully effective, and we did not feel it at first; but, foreseeing the result of our policy—

He declares he—urged our repeal of discriminating duties in 1802, as to all nations that would do the same for us.

But that eastern influence defeated him till the treaty of Amiens opened their eyes. He continues:

British vessels obtained cotton at Charleston, while our ships could not get a pound, because it was better for the planter to pay English freight than to carry his cotton in United States ships free.

And, therefore, when he introduced his bill for repealing discriminating duties, in 1815, it passed without opposition.

This was the much-famed act of 1815—the act which some gentlemen now say ruined our shipping.

But—

up to June, 1822, no foreign ships were admitted to British West India colonies. Great Britain sparred with us successfully for advantage. They let our goods into Canada and then shipped them in their ships to the West Indies at lower duties than were charged when carried in our ships. Our flour carried in their ships was taxed 1 shilling per barrel, as against 5 shillings if shipped in ours, and then, finally, English colonial ports were closed to us in 1826. At that time—the value of our exports to British colonies was $4,263,000, while the value of all our exports, exclusive of cotton, was $22,330,000.

He says—

Mr. Holmes discussed the bill. He feared that merely closing our seaports, and not stopping our exports over our Canadian border, would help England, and so he thought the bill would hurt us.

Our exports will cross over into Canada and be thence carried entirely in British vessels.

He discusses our restrictive act of 1820 and its injury to us. He says that at that time we carried seven-eighths of colonial imports and British ships one-eighth, and therefore we paid seven-eighths of their port dues. Mr. Silsbee spoke. He says that from 1783 to 1818 our trade with the colonies was regulated by British laws and was a British monopoly. He declares he had never heard any complaint of our treaty of 1815 till then—1827. He continues:

It has been suggested, in opposition to still further extension of the policy of 1815 to all kinds of merchandise, that since 1815 our foreign tonnage has declined, but a moment's consideration will show that here, as in many other cases, events following each other are not connected as cause and effect.

That our foreign tonnage in 1816 was, to be sure, 1,300,000, and is now, or was in 1825, only about 1,055,446, but that it is not to be forgotten that in 1816 foreigners enjoyed 258,000 tons, or one-fifth of the whole, while in 1825 they enjoyed only 95,060 tons, or about one-tenth of the whole. That the decline, then, is not from the removal of discriminating duties, but undoubtedly has arisen from the long peace in Europe. He also cites that our coastwise tonnage has risen over 200,000 tons in the 10 years. He continues:

Removal of every unequal and odious distinction will promote harmony in our foreign intercourse. The present state of our intercourse with the British West Indies is a strong illustration of the folly of such measures of discrimination.

He then elaborates upon the great harm to us from restrictions on our trade with the British West Indies and says this may prove a useful lesson to all nations of the impolicy of an unprofitable adherence to discriminating duties. The debate continuing, Mr. Foote "apprehended no opposition to the principles of the bill * * *. There was but one opinion among commercial men of the country." The bill was engrossed without division.

Mr. Chairman, I have been quoting the substance of what various Senators said simply to show what statesmen then thought of the policy of discriminating duties when its effects were clear in the minds of all men. I might add that a pretty thorough perusal of the debates I have referred to shows me there was practical unanimity of opinion. I might quote a few more expressions from different Senators. In April, 1826, Mr. Smith, of Maryland, said:

All agree that our discriminating duties ought to be repealed. Meantime our merchants are paying to the Colonial Treasury fifty to sixty thousand dollars per annum.

In February, 1828, Mr. Woodbury discussed the same question. He began with the history of our discriminating duties. He tells the same story I have already quoted from other Senators. He makes some points a little more clear. He shows that the act of 1815 repealed all discriminating duties on vessels of other nations and goods brought in them, "which were the product of the nation to whom the vessel belonged," provided that nation gave us like fair treatment; and that the act of 1824 extended the principle to goods "first usually shipped" from the ports of the country owning the vessel; that by the act of 1817, in order to meet certain discriminating duties against us, we levied a duty of $2 per ton on British vessels from certain ports, and that by the convention of 1822 and by our act of 1823 we charged the French $1 per ton on their vessels and $3.75 per ton on the cargo in them; that Swedish vessels, by convention of 1818, came under the terms of our act of 1815, and so forth. He continues, "The present act proposes to do away with the whole of these remaining discriminations." He discusses our efforts to do this in 1825, and sets out many treaties negotiated by us to effectuate the same policy, and declares—

We are the carriers to other nations; we are known by experience to possess a skill and economy in building vessels, and that nine-tenths of the tonnage in our foreign trade is now ours 13 years after the act of 1815.

It is passing strange, if discriminating dues were such a good thing for us, as some gentlemen now contend, that we were so anxious to get rid of them when we had them.

Our controversy with Great Britain about removing the shackles and discriminations from our trade with her western colonies seems to have hung on, notwithstanding all men of all parties in this country were trying to terminate it, believing that such shackles and discriminations were wholly hurtful to commerce and were a remnant of the narrow, foolish, and selfish policies of an age gone by. Somehow the question could not be settled until Andrew Jackson became President.

PRESIDENT JACKSON'S ACTION.

President Jackson seems to be the idol of those who now twist the British lion's tail, of those who now propose and defend discriminating duties, and yet Mr. Wilson in his "Epochs of American History," page 84, says:

Perhaps the most satisfactory part of Jackson's record as President is to be found in his settlement of two interesting and important questions affecting the foreign relations of the country. Guided by Van Buren in matters which required delicacy, he exhibited the same initiative and energy and diplomacy which characterized him in dealing with questions of domestic policy. Trade with the West India Islands had seemed ever since colonial times the rightful and natural outlet of our commerce, but when the States ceased to be colonies they parted with the privileges as well as with the disadvantages of belonging to the British Empire, and began to be excluded from their former free intercourse with neighboring British possessions. Until 1825, England kept steadily to her policy of favoring her own ships in trade with all her colonial ports, and laying all manner of restrictions upon ships of other nations, and there seemed no hope of ever breaking down her exclusive navigation system. The only thing that could be done according to the notions of the time in such matters was done; countervailing restrictions were laid upon English ships in their trade with American ports. In 1825, however, under the influence of Mr. Huskisson, England offered to open her ports and the ports of her colonies to the vessels of any nation that would open her own ports to English vessels upon the same terms that should be extended to the latter. The offer was left open for one year. Congress did not take advantage of it, and when Gallatin for the Adams administration proposed after the close of the period to negotiate the question of the trade relationship between the two countries England declined. Jackson saw the value of the West India trade to the United States. * * * He moved toward his object with his usual directness. He sent McLane to England to say that the Adams administration had been rejected by the American people; that the new administration was of a new mind; that the United States would repeal all her own restrictions upon the carrying trade of England if England would remove hers upon the carrying trade of the United States to the West India ports. Congress the while, May 29, 1830, passed an act to the same effect. Lord Aberdeen said that was all that England had ever demanded, and the affair was settled.

This was the action of perhaps the second greatest Democrat of our early history. It ended the practice of discriminating duties by the United States. For more than 50 years no Democrat of any standing dared to advocate a return to that policy, nor did anyone else seriously urge it. For 30 years, from 1830 to 1860, our commerce increased and our navigation prospered as did that of no other nation in the world, save possibly Great Britain. The war between the States wrought some havoc with our foreign shipping, but our tariff policy, increasing the cost of the ships allowed to be registered by us and to carry our flag, brought about its final destruction, and then the shipowners began to knock at the door of Congress, asking for subsidies. Despairing of persuading the American people to grant them great subsidies, they have turned their efforts toward discriminating duties. If there is a Member of the House or of the Senate who would go back to the quagmires and pitfalls, the miserable squabbles and struggles of discriminating duties, it is either because he does not know the history of the question or because he is so blinded by his devotion to the selfish shipowning interest, or so blind to the interest of the whole people, or so befuddled by jingoism and self-serving heroics about our flag on the sea that he is incapable of reasoning on the question. The gentleman from Minnesota has shown us what would perhaps be the first consequence of our discrimination in the Panama Canal—that is, retaliation against us by Canada in our navigation of her Canadian canal and the St. Lawrence River. The nations of the earth can get back at us in a thousand ways by petty discriminations and annoyances, and we who have preached freedom of the seas, equality of the ships upon the sea, from the days of Thomas Jefferson, will find our commerce shackled and strangled at every turn and corner of the world, because we will have belied our own teachings and denied our own faith; and we are asked, Mr. Speaker, to do this iniquitous thing in the name of Jackson who killed the practice finally and forever and in the name of Jefferson whose whole life and teachings are a protest against the principle. [Loud applause.]

TRADE BALANCES.

Mr. Speaker, there is another line of argument, a kind of side line pursued by the advocates of discriminating duties, of subsidies, and of free tolls. It may not be very interesting to enter into that argument, and still before I close I believe that for the benefit of those who may have been appealed to by it I should do so briefly. It is contended that as a great Nation we ought to carry the great bulk of our foreign trade in American bottoms. It is hinted that we can not be a really prosperous Nation unless we do so, and that in order to do so we ought, if necessary, to grant almost unlimited subsidies to our foreign-going ships, so as to have a merchant marine bearing our flag upon the seas in all quarters of the globe. Upon this proposition ship subsidists grow pathetically eloquent and patriotic, recalling the days when we did carry in ships bearing our flag more than half our foreign trade. Again, these subsidists and advocates of discriminating tonnage dues and free tolls to our ships talk long and loud about the fact that we are now paying to vessels of foreign nations vast sums in freight which would be paid to our own people if our goods were carried in our own ships, and they claim that this freight so paid by us stands in the way of a larger trade balance in our favor in our dealings with other nations. The loud-mouthed proponents of this proposition place the amount of freight we pay in this way to foreign ships all the way from $250,000,000 to more than $300,000,000 per year, and they speak of it in such a way as to induce their hearers to believe that that sum is a loss, practically a total loss, to our people. A little common sense ought to be applied to these propositions. In the first place, it is evident that when several great nations trade with each other all of them can not, each for himself, carry more than half the commerce between itself and the other nations. If one nation carries more than half the tonnage of its foreign trade some other nation must carry less than half the tonnage of its foreign trade, and so while England carries more than half its foreign trade, the United States, Germany, France, and, I think, Russia and Austria, carry less than half their foreign trade, the United States carrying a less per cent of its foreign trade than any one of them, and being in fact, now and for many years, the most prosperous of all of them.

It is argued that while trade balances have been in our favor for many years, they would have been much larger if we had carried our own goods and paid no freight money to foreigners. That plausible argument is really so shallow it is a mystery to me how it deludes any man of fair intelligence. The value of all commodities exchanged in trade includes every element of value in each article at the time and place of the exchange—its growth, its improvement or transformation or manufacture from raw material into finished product, and its transportation to its market place and its safe-keeping there until it is sold or exchanged. Suppose England brings dry goods worth $100, English price, to our market. They become here $100 plus freight, or, say, $105. They are here traded for our goods worth $105, our price, and she then carries the American goods back to London, and there they are worth $105 plus freight, or, say, $110. England has apparently imported $10 worth of goods more than she exported. The customs books may show that way. The customs books may also show that we exported $5 more than we imported, taking English price for our imports and our price for our exports. Neither showing is true. What England gives to us in labor product is precisely what she receives from us in labor product. What she has given and received at the time and place of the exchange—that is, here where the exchange is made—is $105 worth of labor product. Her transportation after the exchange of the goods—raw cotton, for example—is just an element of value which she adds to it after the trade, precisely as is her manufacture of the cottton into cloth. All fair trade is exchange of commodities, value for value, whether the commodity be fruit of the soil, product of the mine or factory, or freight, or gold.

THE BALANCE OF TRADE IS AN IGNIS FATUUS.

In every honest, fair exchange there is no trade balance. Nations grow richer or poorer in proportion as they produce more or less relatively, or trade more or less shrewdly, or live more or less frugally. Always when you count the credits and moneys and commodities given and received at the agreed price the account must and does balance. In real trade settlements all transportation chargeable to either party must be accounted for, precisely as any other commodity furnished or money paid by one party or the other.

A thousand bales of cotton sold to spinners in Liverpool brings a sum equal to the sum paid the grower, say, in middle Texas, the profit taken by the cotton buyer, the freight paid to the railway to carry it to Galveston, and to the ship to carry it across the Atlantic. It took all this to produce the cotton in Liverpool. Now, if the spinner manufactures this same cotton and sells it to a merchant in Dallas, Tex., the price paid by him must be, in addition to legitimate profits paid middlemen, all the sums paid by the spinner, plus the cost of manufacture and of shipment back to Dallas, and each element of the cost or value will be contributed by those people who under the modern economic system of division of labor are best and most economically equipped for the purpose. Some will grow, some will spin, and some will carry. Wise economy demands that only those best equipped shall perform each special labor. There is no mystery in all this matter of exchange. It is only the bewildering and infinite number of acts done that confuse us. Now, practically we know that what we sell must be paid for in something, and that as we ourselves manufacture nearly all the cotton goods we use, England must in the main pay for our raw cotton in something else than cotton goods returned; and we know that if England buys our cotton here and carries it herself she will pay us for it at the price here, while if we carried it she would pay us the price here plus the carrying cost, and so could buy less of our cotton; so that the question of carrying resolves itself into the question of which one of us can best afford to carry it. If by reason of cheaper ships or cheaper labor or for any other reason England can produce a cheaper unit of transportation than we, she will carry it in preference to paying us to do it, and if some other carrier can produce a cheaper unit of transportation than either of us, such other carrier will do the work. This, I think, states the economic law of international transportation. Business and the business man know no flag. When not interfered with by laws or by monopoly or combination, competition controls. In the past we have had to deal with interferences by law; now and for the future we must deal with monopoly and combination of transportation companies. Both are evils. The first we may avoid, as we have done heretofore largely by treaties made to secure fairness and equal treatment of all ships of all nations; the latter—that is, combination—we are trying now to frame laws to control. Let me repeat, transportation is a labor essential to commerce and an element of production as truly as growing and manufacturing, and if transportation is given us in part pay for our commodities we are no worse off than if any other product of foreign labor had been given us in its stead or than we would be if we did the carrying for other nations in exchange for other commodities produced by them. I measure my words when I say that if a part of the people of the United States are to become carriers of freight and passengers over seas in our trade with other nations it ought to be because they can do so with advantage to those of us needing the service, and that the people of the United States as a whole are not by subsidy, discriminating duties, or other method going to burden themselves to build up a trade or calling to be pursued by a special few that can not sustain itself against the world in our trade with the world, because to do so would mean that we chose to labor 10 days to secure a commodity which we can buy of another with the product of 9 days of our labor in some other field.

Now, further as to the balance of trade, we have had it for many years in our favor. We have been sending out more products than we have been receiving back. This has been our apparent balance of trade settled in gold or credits. If this process continues unbrokenly and indefinitely, and if no other factor enters in, it is evident that in time we shall have a corner on gold. What has prevented our corner on gold? I would like to have the answer of the greatest, wisest political economist. I would like for him to tell us, also, what we would do with all the gold if we had it and what the other nations would do without it. Certainly we produce more than we consume and we sell our surplus. Why do not we get all the gold?

WHY WE DO NOT CORNER GOLD.

It seems to me that I see the reasons: First, for generations before I was born the Old World produced and garnered gold and property. In our very beginning we became debtors. We borrowed from them as undeveloped countries are borrowing to-day from us. We must pay them back, principal and interest—especially interest—out of our surplus. We pay interest on notes and bonds—National, State, municipal, corporate, and personal. Our aggregate principal indebtedness has perhaps never decreased since 1800. It is perhaps larger now than ever before. We farm our lands and work our factories. They—that is, our creditors—farm and work us. As the gold comes in to pay us for our surplus, we send it back to pay our interest, or rather the gold ordinarily neither comes nor goes, but credits and debits are made on the books. If we did not use our surplus to pay interest to Europe, we still would not corner gold. Our high and mighty would sequester it and carry it away into new lands by way of loans or investments there, or go touring or yachting or building castles abroad or scattering it with lavish hand in all lands. With such outgo we must have a trade balance in our favor or go broke. But there are other things we are doing in this trade balancing.

SQUANDERING OUR INHERITANCE.

Besides paying with our surplus products the interest on our debt and the spendings of our untitled lords, we are also using up and exhausting the God-given richness of our soil, our mines, and our forests. How much of this we are doing no one knows, but perhaps we ought to find out, or at least think about it, before gloating over our trade balances, especially if it be true, as I opine, that we are growing more and more heavily in debt to Europe and that our rich people are scattering our earnings abroad more and more extravagantly. If we exchange an honest dollar's worth of corn for an honest dollar's worth of transportation, no man need shed crocodile tears. We have lost nothing; both parties to the exchange may, and most likely have, profited by it; but when the fruits of our country's toil and the riches of our national resources are scattered abroad by the profligate or paid out as interest on a debt that represents indefensible extravagance, then is our country robbed and its just prosperity diminished.

NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

I have referred to the talk about nations only prospering if they are great water carriers. I wish to repeat that such statements seem to me absurd in the presence of the fact that we are the most prosperous Nation on earth and have carried for many years and carry now less than 10 per cent of our foreign trade. It is even worse than it seems, because much of the labor on ships bearing our flag is done by foreigners. We have been increasingly prosperous as our foreign-trade carrying has decreased.

No man is a sound reasoner who compares this with other times or ages and makes no allowance for changed conditions.

FORMER AGES.

It is true all prosperous nations trade largely with other nations. To do this in former times it was necessary to have ships, both fighting and merchant ships. Hence Tyre and Carthage and Athens and Rome and Genoa and Venice and Spain and Holland and England in times gone by had to have both fighting and merchant ships in order to trade. Rome had perhaps proportionally less than any other great nation, because she was powerful enough not to fear attacks upon her trade. Once or twice she had to fight pirates. A few times she used ships in war; but in the main she was content to let Egypt carry her corn, and I doubt if she every had a trade balance in her favor. In the Middle Ages especially there came into being what were known as sea powers and with them fighting fleets protecting merchant marines. The seas were covered with fighting ships and with pirates, and the statutes of all trading nations were full of restrictions and burdens to hinder the commerce of other nations. All that changed with the nineteenth century. The world has learned that two nations may be, nay always are, both benefited by fairness and equality of trade between them, while the very word "pirate" has gone to join the limbo of devils, ghosts, and goblins. Only grim-visaged war holds its horrid possibility to fright the sea merchant from the main or private capital from investing in ships under any flag, and even war holds no such terrors for the merchantman as it did of old.

TO-DAY.

Transportation to-day is business. It will buy its ships where it can buy them cheapest and fly the flag that pays the best. The truth is that to-day merchant ships and ship companies know no country and no country's trade. The investigations of the Committee on Merchant Marine into the shipping combinations of the world and of our own coastwise trade proved this absolutely. These investigations proved that the great ship lines and corporations, whether English, German, or French, adjusted their freight rates, their routes of travel, and every other thing in their management and operation absolutely and solely upon considerations of profit and loss to their business, and just precisely in the same way as if some impersonal, denationalized, and cold intelligence were in control. We found no shadow of favoritism toward or discrimination against any nationality, no national friendship or enmity. These corporations work in perfect harmony and combination. They sit above the dividing lines of all the nations and in a realm of supernationalism they rule all the seas for the sole benefit of business, their business. They are ready to seek benefits and bounties and subsidies from any and all nations, and they are insistent and persistent in such seeking, but the benefits, bounties, and subsidies when gained are never allowed to interfere in the slightest with their combinations and their universal control. They nail whatever flag to their ship mast it best pays them in dollars and cents to nail there, and the ship sails whatever route and to whatever port or ports it may with most profit, and in whatever port or under whatever flag the ship may be all nationalities fare alike on board.

TRIUMPH—NOT SURRENDER.

As to our coastwise trade, we have done the worst thing we could for the public. We have favored it by excluding all foreign-built or foreign-owned ships; we have turned it over to a home combination as all-powerful as any in the world, and then we have saddled that combination with a shipbuilding monopoly. The two find it to their interest to work in harmony. For this we pay dearly in the highest-priced sea-borne freight in all the world in our coasting trade, while thousands of empty vessels forbidden to carry our freight steam from one to another of our ports every week and every day. It is to this coastwise monopoly our law gives the great bounty of free tolls. It is that law we would repeal. They talk to us about shameful surrender to Great Britain. We have triumphed. The canal is our own. It is the property of the whole people of the United States. No other nation has a voice in its control, and we have only bound ourselves to be just. It was a great triumph to secure the sole possession and military control of the canal. Having secured that, we should and shall be just. We shall not surrender to England, we shall not surrender to interested coast cities. We shall not surrender to selfish monopoly. We built the canal by taxes laid on all the people of the United States, and if we are not traitors to them we will not give it away, but see to it, as we would if it were our private property, that every man, English, German, American, or of any other nation, who uses it pays fairly for its use.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRIEST].

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the Panama Canal tolls question it should be borne in mind that national dishonor lies no less in the direction of an abject and humiliating surrender to an unreasonable demand from foreign power or potentate than in honorable adherence to the patriotic view of controverted construction of a treaty between nations. It is wholly unjustifiable to assert that the legal construction placed upon the various treaties preceding the building of the canal by such distinguished and patriotic Americans as former Presidents Roosevelt and Taft, Philander C. Knox, Richard Olney, CHAMP CLARK, JAMES R. MANN, OSCAR UNDERWOOD, and a majority of the Representatives and Senators in the Sixty-second Congress, as well as by impartial English authority, reflects discredit upon the United States or in any wise warrants the imputation of "national dishonor." Our country and our countrymen cherish alike national honor and individual integrity; and surely the sole arbiter of our Nation's honor is not to be found among those who would, without even an appeal to arbitration or to a supreme judicial tribunal, furl our flag and forego rights that are defended and justified by able and conscientious students of the laws of nations. Simply to surrender these rights and to reverse the solemn action of the legislative and executive branches of our Government at the behest of a foreign power, and by reason of entanglements elsewhere, is contrary to the true spirit of America, and could very properly be characterized as conduct akin to "national dishonor."

The disputed section is part of an act approved August 24, 1912. It provides that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States—American vessels flying the American flag—are exempt from the payment of tolls when passing through the Panama Canal. Discretion was left in the President when levying tolls, based on net registered tonnage on ships of commerce of the United States and its citizens, to fix such tolls lower than on foreign ships, and, contrary to the expectation of England, President Taft fixed on all ships in the foreign trade, including our own ships, a rate that is perfectly fair and equitable, and is so admitted, being sufficient in amount to defray in time the maintenance and interest charges on the capital expenditure of $375,000,000, notwithstanding the exemption from tolls of our coastwise vessels. When the law was enacted sentiment was so favorable thereto that the bill passed the Democratic House by 147 ayes to 128 nays, the Republican Senate by a vote of 48 to 18, and was approved by President Taft, notwithstanding a protest from England. This protest was replied to and refuted in a note sent to the English Government by Secretary of State Knox, who insisted that "this Government does not agree with the interpretation placed by Sir Edward Grey upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty." The present President of the United States, then a candidate for the Presidency, in public addresses pointed out the obvious economic advantages of the legislation; and the political party of which he was the candidate for President proclaimed in its platform that American ships engaged in coastwise trade should pay no tolls to the end that cheap transportation by water would enforce cheaper transportation by the competing transcontinental railroads, and it is interesting to note that the same platform assures a confiding people that "our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign."

More than a year has elapsed since the enactment of this law and its acceptance by the Government and the people of the United States. In that time, however, international problems of the present administration have developed threatening and embarrassing difficulties, and powerful influences, quick to seize advantage of diplomacy that has proven to be weak rather than watchful, now insist that there are antagonistic foreign views on the question of exempting American coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. As a result, the American Congress and the American people are asked not to submit the dispute to arbitration or to the Supreme Court of the United States, as could be readily done, but to supinely surrender vital national interests, and thereby an inefficient foreign policy may escape the legitimate results of its inefficiency. Without information or explanation, Congress is calmly told by President Wilson that American interests must be sacrificed "in support of the foreign policy of the administration" no matter "whether we are right or wrong." This request was made before the joint session of Congress on March 5, 1914, in the following remarkable language:

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.
> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

In international disputes involving principles, policy, honor, or other important issues, political or personal opinions should be subordinated to the importance of sustaining the Executive when he is right without regard to the political party with which a President may claim allegiance. Therefore my mind was in a receptive mood when President Wilson appeared before the joint session of the Senate and House to deliver an address concerning the Panama Canal controversy. On the occasions of his previous addresses many of us differed diametrically with the political policies which he advocated, and it was not expected that his personal appearance would do more than illumine his political theories. But as the question of national honor had here been raised, and as it was announced that the President deemed the issue so vital as to necessitate a hurriedly arranged personal appeal to Congress, I had decided that should he offer reasons which appeared to me to be sound and logical, and not in contravention of our country's dignity and honor, it would be my duty to reverse the position taken by me in the Sixty-second Congress and to support his recommendation for the repeal of the free-toll section of the Panama act

It was distinctly disappointing to note the absence of information and explanation in the President's address to Congress, and in lieu thereof only a personal appeal that we abjectly yield, "right or wrong," to foreign demand.

I found therein no sufficient reason to justify a reversal of my attitude and to vote for an unqualified repeal of legislation which Congress had enacted in good faith with the undoubted approval of a large majority of the American people.

There was not only conspicuous lack of information in the President's appeal, but likewise palpable error of statement. He is clearly mistaken when he says that "everywhere else" the language of the treaty is construed differently from the interpretation placed upon it here, and that its construction is "not debated outside the United States." On the contrary, even in England able authority upholds the position taken by the Government of the United States in the act of August 24, 1912. In the London Law Magazine and Review, a reputable and widely-known quarterly devoted to jurisprudence, only a few months before President Wilson declared that "everywhere else" our position is misunderstood, appeared an exhaustive review of the entire controversy from the pen of Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, an eminent British authority, who concludes his article in these significant words:

> To sum up, it is reasonably arguable—
> (a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on grounds of general justice;

(b) That there is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and
(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate, an impartial, and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the same magazine also an exceedingly able and illuminating exposition of the matter is set forth by Dr. C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, a widely known British writer on international law. He makes plain that—

Great Britain, by assent and ratification, under circumstances similar to those that have arisen in the Panama Canal act, is not now in a position to insist on an interpretation of the equality clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty different from that in accordance with the established interpretation she herself has put upon like clauses in other treaties. And this is precisely what she has always done and is doing to-day. No explanation or recrimination—can alter the fact that Great Britain has always adhered tenaciously, like other seagirt nations, to the policy of favoring coastwise vessels, and that wherever Britannia rules they form a class separate and distinct from vessels employed in foreign trade, and they have always been excepted from the term "vessels" as used in all international agreements.

Continues the learned writer—

The important point in this statement is that there are like clauses in other treaties which are interpreted by the English Government in the interest of English coastwise vessels, thus giving emphasis to her inconsistent attitude in connection with the Panama Canal controversy. These convincing arguments of eminent English authorities need but to be mentioned to demonstrate the erroneous statement of the President in his personal appeal to Congress that our attitude is "everywhere else" misunderstood, and not even "debated outside the United States."

In view of the foregoing, it is idle to assert that differences of opinion over the verbiage and meaning of the treaty presage war, as has been intimated on and off the floor of the House by partisans of this proposed repeal. It is apparent that no nation has threatened war, and no self-respecting nation could afford to sacrifice the interests of its people because of such threats. The majority report of the House committee asserts that "there has as yet been no friction, or even strained relations, with foreign governments," but, "we are advised," this report says, "that the opposite party to the principal treaty under which the canal was constructed fails to approve our action in providing for exemption or to concur in our construction of the treaty." In other words, a foreign country "fails to approve," and the hue and cry is raised that our own Government is necessarily wrong. This failure of foreign powers to approve things done by the Government and people of the United States has a familiar sound, and if this Nation had always given heed to such arguments, as we are now asked to do, many great and glorious American achievements would not now be emblazoned on the pages of history.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, go into the many lines of argument bearing on this matter. They only serve to make confusion more confounded. There is but one question properly involved in the present controversy. National honor surely forbids that one question to be the necessities engendered by inapt management of our foreign affairs, great and grave as these necessities are now admitted to be. The one question of paramount importance is this: Is the United States violating a treaty with England by exempting from canal-toll charges American vessels flying the American flag engaged in the coastwise trade? The preponderance of learned opinion, as I have endeavored to indicate, undoubtedly gives ample assurance that the United States has acted well within its treaty rights; and, that being the case, not only national dishonor but the contemptuous opinion of the patriotic peoples of all the earth await the legislative renunciation demanded by the President of the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those Democrats who, in 1912, acting with a majority of my party in the House, voted against the free-tolls amendment to the Panama Canal act. I did so then because I regarded that provision as a subsidy to the coastwise shipping trust, and because the Democratic Party, to which I have the honor of belonging, has from time immemorial been opposed to ship subsidies, and to all other kinds of subsidies.

I am in favor of the passage of the present repeal bill, because I am still opposed to the undemocratic and un-American policy of subsidies to special interests, whatever form they may take, and I can not be frightened into voting for such a subsidy by the false cry of those favored interests, "You are surrendering to England."

The best kind of Englishman I know of is the Irishman. I have no sympathy for any English contention about this canal. I believe President Roosevelt and the Republican Party committed an egregious blunder in contracting at all with England about our canal. There was no necessity for this treaty. I would vote to-morrow to abrogate the treaty that you Republicans contracted for us when you were in power if a bill were introduced for that manly purpose. But as long as that treaty is the supreme law of the land, under my oath of office I will uphold it; and whether it is abrogated or not, I will never agree by my vote that special selfish interests shall use the well-merited unpopularity of that treaty to filch further special privileges and benefits from the pockets of the American people. [Applause.]

We have built this wonderful canal at the enormous expense of $400,000,000, and it is now ready for use. The owners of coastwise vessels have not put up a dollar of this money. What will they get out of it? By law they have already been relieved of any competition with foreign ships, which are prohibited from engaging in our coastwise trade. By the act of 1912 they have already been relieved of any competition from railroad-owned ships, their greatest competitors. By the use of the canal they are able to save the expense of doubling South America, a saving of $2.70 minimum and $4 maximum per ton on every ton of freight hauled by them, even if they pay tolls. In addition to this their business will be vastly increased by the operation of the long-and-short-haul provision of the interstate commerce act, and, finally, they will be given free insurance and free pilotage and towage through the canal itself. This treatment has certainly been more than generous, and still this greedy trust is not yet satisfied, but want us to tax the American people still further in their interest by giving them free tolls.

Let us pause and look at the question a moment and see what we are doing. Let us look at the matter from a business standpoint and figure the cost to the American people.

This is the statement of the canal account:

DEBITS.

Cost of maintenance and operation	$5,000,000
Interest on bonds for construction account	12,000,000
Cost of maintaining 8,000 soldiers to protect the canal	8,000,000
Cost of maintaining 2,000 marines to protect the canal	2,000,000
Total	27,000,000

CREDITS.

Revenues from canal, including coastwise tolls, as estimated by Col. Goethals and Dr. Johnson	10,000,000
Leaving a yearly deficit of	17,000,000

Here we have a losing concern, costing the American people $17,000,000 yearly to keep up, and yet there are some of us who would add to the deficit, and deliberately vote to the greatest beneficiaries of the canal an additional bounty or subsidy of perhaps $2,000,000 per year. Where does this subsidy go? Look at the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee and you will see that it will go in largest measure to the United Fruit Trust and United States Steel Corporation and to the Standard Oil and three other companies. And yet some of you gentlemen are being deluded with the false idea that you are voting to uphold the patriotic principle of freedom from England. You are doing nothing of the kind. You are simply voting to give more of the people's money to these trusts.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], in one of the ablest addresses I ever heard delivered in this House, made all further argument on the question of the treaty absolutely unnecessary, and I shall not go into that. But to the Democrats who are going to vote against this bill because of the utterance of our Baltimore platform I wish to say a word.

The platform utterances on this subject are absolutely contradictory.

In the beginning of that paragraph in the platform on this subject we have the usual and time-honored declaration against ship bounties or subsidies, a Democratic doctrine that is as old as the party itself. In a subsequent part of this same paragraph we find this contradictory free-tolls statement, this tare sown in our Democratic wheat, a tare that it is now so vigorously defended by our Republican friends that well, indeed, may we believe that "an enemy hath done this." I do not know what you, my Democratic colleagues, are going to do about it. That is a matter for your conscience; but as for me, I am going to pin my faith to the spirit of that platform, to the words in it that are in accordance with the party's history and its best traditions and its highest honor, and I will throw out, as the surplusage of greed, the words which would grant special favors to a privileged class and violate all the honest expressions of the party since its birth.

But our enemies are claiming that to do this will cause a split in our party. I do not believe it. I have too much faith in our party to believe that we will ever fall out among ourselves because we do not vote a bounty to a shipping trust. My prediction is that the Democrat or Republican or Progressive who expects a split in our party for not giving a subsidy to a special interest is going to be woefully mistaken. [Applause.]

And to you gentlemen, irrespective of party, who are boasting about your red blood, and are declaring that your patriotism is too great to allow you to bow the knee to England, I want to say this word: Look well to what you are doing. These coastwise vessels will be owned or chartered principally by the Steel Trust, the Oil Trust, and the Fruit Trust. These trusts own or charter hundreds of ships now, according to Dr. Johnson. They fly the Stars and Stripes only where necessary. The most of them at present ply under foreign flags. They will get the benefit of these subsidies by means of so-called chartered vessels. Patriotism has a meaning to them only when it satisfies their greed. Take care lest your mistaken sympathy lead you to vote further privileges to these special interests; take care lest your overzealous and misguided patriotism lead you to vote the people's money into the coffers of corporate greed; take care lest you bow the knee to as conscienceless a lot of commercial pirates as ever scuttled a ship on the Spanish Main or levied a tribute of ransom upon a helpless and fallen foe. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

[Mr. FOSTER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

[Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, according to the way I look at this matter, the Democratic Party is called upon to carry out a Democratic doctrine, a doctrine that we have adhered to from the days of Jefferson. We have in our platform a proposition permitting no subsidies or bounties to ships, and on the tail of that your Republican doctrine to let certain ships go through the canal free of all duties——

Mr. ELDER. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. QUIN. I will, sir.

Mr. ELDER. As a lawyer, I will ask the gentleman, if you have a direct proposition, as in this case——

Mr. QUIN. Excuse me. I have not time to yield to discuss a legal proposition.

Mr. ELDER. I am asking as a lawyer——

Mr. QUIN. Excuse me, but I can not yield. I am a lawyer as well as the gentleman from Louisiana. I want to say that I am lawyer enough to know what special privileges are anywhere I see them. I have a nose that can scent out special privilege, just like the President of the United States has done. We know that special privilege works like cascarets—while the people sleep. Special privilege was at work at Baltimore when that platform was made. I say, sir, right now that the body of the American people know that it is nothing but a subsidy to a lot of ships owned by two great corporations in this country.

I want to say that $888,000 of this $400,000,000 that we took up to pay for this canal came right from my district. I do not propose for the 44,400 families in my district to pay $20 apiece to allow certain rich corporations in this country to use that canal free of charge. [Applause.]

It will take about $30,000,000 a year to operate that canal, and the actual cost to the Government in electricity and help to put one of these coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal will cost $1,500 to $6,000 on the estimate of Col. Goethals. Do you mean to contend that the Democratic Party ever intended to take this money out of the pockets of the people and give it to a few big corporations?

For more than 130 years the Democratic Party has been on record against granting bounties or subsidies to ships. Here is the Democratic platform for 1912:

We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine which will develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republic of the South, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Later on in the same section we find this little paragraph in direct conflict with the above true Democratic doctrine:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competition with the canal.

When you eliminate all of the coastwise ships owned by railroad companies there remains only the vessels of two big corporations to have the special privilege of using this $400,000,000 enterprise, costing $30,000,000 a year to keep up and operate out of the taxes of the American people. Which part of this platform are we to follow?

The President of the United States, the titular head of the Democratic Party, came in person on the 5th day of March and read his message to Congress urging us to repeal the law giving these coastwise vessels the use of the Panama Canal free of charge.

I quote the language President Wilson used on that memorable occasion:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is moreover in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

I think the President is right on both propositions. Just before the Democratic convention assembled at Baltimore in 1912 the lower House of Congress passed that toll exemption by 9 majority. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD discloses the fact that is was passed by 72 Democrats voting with the majority of the Republicans, and 94 Democrats voted against this exemption. After it was "eased" into the platform at Baltimore, of course the Democrats in the Senate had to vote for this outrage. The President of the United States, the real head of our party, has the people's interest at heart. He is not asking us to do violence to the party platform, but he is asking us to comply with the Democratic elements of that platform, to protect the people of this country from the pillage and exploitation of special interests, and at the same time comply with the written and implied contract this Government made with Great Britain that made it possible to construct the Panama Canal. Shall we pursue the course of courage and honor to our country, or shall we permit certain shipowners to get some of the people's money for nothing and slap the President in the face and insult Great Britain?

Sirs, my duty is plain to me; I am going to record the 222,000 people whom I have the honor to represent on the side of justice and integrity, special privileges to none and equal justice to all. I am going to record them with my vote on the side of our patriotic President and the people in this great fight. We are not called upon to truckle to Great Britain, but we are urged to stand for the right and correct a wrong which we know grants special privileges to the few at the expense of the many, and at the same time violates our solemn obligation to a friendly foreign Government. No man can defend this exemption of certain American ships being passed through the Panama Canal free, unless he is in favor of subsidies or bounties to these ships.

Mr. Speaker, when this proposition is analyzed, it is plain that the money which was gathered from the people to construct and fortify that canal makes it the property of the people, and all the people should as nearly as possible equally share in its use and benefit. My constituents will pay $177,000 annually to maintain and operate that canal. They have already paid $888,000 in its construction. The highest estimate is that by charging all the ships $1.20 a ton for freight through the canal the Government can collect $13,000,000 a year in tolls; then this leaves a net loss of $17,000,000 to be paid out of the pockets of the people of this country. It is estimated that we would get $3,000,000 in toll charges from these coastwise vessels that are now permitted to pass through free. Do you think I would vote to take this money out of the pockets of my constituents and give it to these big, rich shipowners? I am always on the side of the people, and in this fight I am by the side of the President and the great Commoner Bryan. Ever since I entered Congress I have observed that both of these distinguished patriots are always for the people. It does not take any brilliant mind to detect the tracks of big business in this contest. They are trying to fool the people of this country by hallooing out that we are letting John Bull run over us. Of course, the big interests of this country always get up a battle cry. All my life I have heard the Republican cry of laying down to England, when the Democrats were fighting the protective-tariff nabobs. That is an excuse those seeking special favors in this instance urge.

Those who oppose this bill to repeal the toll exemption are as honest as I am, but I am following the courage of my convictions. From an economic viewpoint I look at it just like I would if there were a good turnpike road in my own home county which had been built by taxing all the people of the county at a cost of $500,000 and tollgates were put up at certain points along that road, charging every person a reasonable toll to travel the road except persons engaged in the livery-stable business, but if the liveryman were also a farmer he would not be exempted from paying tolls. Why is it that all of the farmers and other people traveling that road should pay tolls, while the liveryman could use it free every day and the taxpayers of the county defraying the expense of building and maintaining that turnpike? The livery-stable man would have a special privilege granted to him over and above all the other citizens, which is wrong in principle and undemocratic. Do you think I would vote to exempt the banks from paying taxes on the pretext that they would lend money to the people at a cheaper interest? Would anyone be fool enough to vote to exempt the railroad companies from taxation on the ground that they would haul freight at a lower rate and therefore the people would get the benefit of the exemption? Sirs, the American Congress in past years took nearly all of the public land in the United States away from the people and gave it to the railroad companies under the guise of inducing capital to construct railroads for the benefit of the people. Now, after plundering the people of all the public land you have taxed them to the sum of $400,000,000 to construct a canal, and now you propose to give $3,000,000 a year in subsidies to two powerful corporations under the law which permits these coastwise vessels to go through the canal at the expense of the people. Gentlemen on this floor say it is our canal and our ships ought to go through it free. The people's ships will go through free, but "our" ships that belong to corporations and money-makers should pay the toll charges. You can not fool anybody with this pronoun "our"; the people know who own "our" railroads, "our" Standard Oil Trust, and "our" coastwise vessels.

Mr. Speaker, this outrage on the people of this country can not be perpetrated by my vote. You had just as well build a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean by taxing the people, and then tax the people to maintain and operate it, and then pick out certain rich corporations in New York and let them ship all the freight they pleased over that road free of charge. Who pays the freight?

The toiling masses in this country have always paid it, and it is time to give them a rest. After Congress has given away virtually all of the public domain in this Republic to a few corporations and syndicates, is it possible that we are going to turn the Panama Canal over to a few corporations for their special benefit?

It shall never be done with my vote. I have faith in President Wilson, and I am going to stay with him in this fight for the people of this country and the honor of our Nation. How is it that a very small number of Democrats and nearly all of the Republicans are lined up together to prevent this toll-exemption law from being repealed?

Do you believe that the Republicans are helping this small minority of Democrats to hold up the Democratic platform?

In voting as I do I am keeping the platform of my party from being made the refuge of one of the most autocratic trusts in the United States.

I append the following to my remarks—the names of the owners of all the ships engaged in coastwise trade:

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] is recognized.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, if the question under discussion concerned only the foreign policy of the present administration the embarrassment of the moment would be greatly relieved. Involving as it does, however, the foreign policy of the Nation for all the centuries to come; challenging as it does the honor and good faith of the administration that negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; challenging as it does the honor and good faith of the Congress which passed and the President who signed the law exempting from the payment of tolls American coastwise trading ships passing through the Panama Canal; and challenging as it does the honor of all the more than thirteen millions of American citizens who by their votes in 1912 approved that law, the demand of the President calls for action that should not be taken without serious consideration. This is not a time to follow blindly the leadership of any man or any party, but instead we should weigh well, from every angle, the circumstances as they are and do the thing our conscience tells us is right.

Mr. Speaker, when I was a candidate for the high office I now hold I told my constituents I should be governed in my actions in Congress entirely by the measure itself rather than by the source from which it came. I said I should stand at all times for any measure that appealed to me as being good, whether the author was a Democrat, a Republican, or a Progressive. I have conscientiously followed out this program. I propose to continue to do so.

It is unfortunate that the diplomatic language as used by the nations of the earth has not been such as to enable the layman to readily and accurately construe the same. It has been such, rather, that finished diplomats often disagree as to the exact meaning of phrases included in the various treaties. When questions in dispute arise the natural, the logical, the sensible thing to do is to learn, if possible, the construction placed upon the treaty by the men who were responsible for and who negotiated it. This should be, and is generally, conceded the highest authority—the court of last resort.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated during the administration and under the personal direction of President Roosevelt. Referring to the same, Mr. Roosevelt said:

> We have a perfect right to permit our coastwise traffic (with which there can be no competition by the merchant marine of any foreign nation, so that there is no discrimination against any foreign marine) to pass through that canal on any terms we choose, and I personally think no tolls should be charged on such traffic.
> But at all times the canal should be open on equal terms to the ships of all nations, including our own, engaged in international commerce. That was the understanding of the treaty when it was adopted, and the United States must always, as a matter of honorable obligation and scrupulous nicety, live up to every consideration which she has entered into with any foreign power.

And in a letter published in the Outlook, January 8, 1913, he said:

> I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and extensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

John Hay, the man who, as Secretary of State, negotiated the treaty, said in the memorandum which he sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

It is unfortunate that the question of our right to remit tolls to our coastwise traffic was not raised by Great Britain prior to the death of this great man, so that he might have been given the opportunity of expressing in clear and definite terms the understanding he had of the terms of the treaty. To my mind, however, he states his position as clearly as he could, without having had the contentions of His Majesty's Government called to his attention, when he said:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal * * *. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

It is very clear that it was the mutual understanding of the two contracting parties that the portion of article 2 of the treaty which says that we shall—> have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal—meant just exactly what it said.

As I have said before, the court of last resort in the interpretation of the language of treaties, is the construction placed upon it by the men who were responsible for it. This has always been accepted as a fact by all the great authorities on international law. I have quoted the man during whose administration the treaty was enacted. He was familiar with every step in the negotiations. I have quoted the man who conducted all the negotiations leading up to the adoption of the treaty, and they were both firmly of the opinion that under the treaty we were entitled to lay down the rules under which other nations were to be allowed to use the property which was exclusively our own.

President Taft, than whom no greater jurist is known to-day, said in part in the memorandum he submitted to Congress at the time he approved the Panama Canal act:

> The provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty involved is contained in article 3, which provides:
> "The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:
> "1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."
> Then follows five other rules to be observed by other nations to make neutralization effective, the observance of which is the condition for the privilege of using the canal. In view of the fact that the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States wholly at its own cost, upon territory ceded to it by the Republic of Panama for that purpose, and that, unless it has restricted itself, the United States enjoys absolute rights of ownership and control, including the right to allow its own commerce the use of the canal upon such terms as it sees fit, the sole question is, Has the United States, in the language above quoted from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, deprived itself of the exercise of the right to pass its own commerce free or to remit tolls collected for the use of the canal?
> It will be observed that the rules specified in article 3 of the treaty were adopted by the United States for a specific purpose, namely, as the basis of the neutralization of the canal, and for no other purpose. The article is a declaration of policy by the United States that the canal shall be neutral; that the attitude of this Government toward the commerce of the world is that all nations will be treated alike and no discrimination made by the United States against any one of them observing the rules adopted by the United States. The right to the use of the canal and to equality of treatment in the use depends upon the observance of the conditions of the use by the nations to whom we extended that privilege. The privileges of all nations to whom we extended the use upon the observance of these conditions were to be equal to that extended to any one of them which observed the conditions. In other words, it was a conditional favored-nation treatment, the measure of which, in the absence of express stipulation to that effect, is not what the country gives to its own nationals, but the treatment it extends to other nations.

Thus it is seen that the rules are but a basis of neutralization, intended to effect the neutrality which the United States was willing should be the character of the canal, and not intended to limit or hamper the United States in the exercise of its sovereign power to deal with its own commerce, using its own canal in whatsoever manner it saw fit.

President Taft signed the bill exempting our coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls, and submitted the above memorandum to Congress in the face of the contentions of His Majesty's Government, having all the arguments, pro and con, before him. No one can seriously question the honor and integrity of this great judge, and had he believed that Great Britain had equitable grounds on which to stand he would unhesitatingly have vetoed the act.

Mr. Speaker, I now propose to quote a man who is attempting at this time to force through Congress, by the free use of the gag rule and, if the reports freely handed about the corridors of the Capitol Building and the hotels are true, coercion through the distribution of patronage, this bill that proposes to relinquish for all time all the rights the United States has in the Panama Canal Zone. The man I shall quote, Mr. Speaker, is the President of the United States. These words were spoken at a time, however, when he was a candidate for the high office he now holds. The speech I here quote was delivered by Mr. Wilson to 2,500 farmers at Washington Park, N. J., August 15, 1912. It is as follows:

Now, there is another matter you know; we are digging a tremendous ditch across the Isthmus of Panama. It is predicted by the engineers in charge of that colossal enterprise that we shall be able to open it to the ships of the world by the year 1915. What interest have you in opening it to the ships of the world? We do not own the ships of the world. By a very ingenious process, which I would not keep you standing in the hot sun long enough to outline, the legislation of the United States has destroyed the merchant marine of the United States. The chief road by which your crops travel to the Orient is through the Suez Canal. They do not go around by the Pacific. Most of your maps do not show you the short road to the Orient, because they are spread out flat.

If you will get a globe and draw a circle around the globe, you will see your short road is through the Suez Canal, not across the Pacific, and that the western farmer, therefore, has to ship his crops across the continent in order to reach the ships that are to take that road. And when his crops reach the port do they find American ships waiting for them? Not at all. In most years not a single ship carrying the American flag goes through that canal carrying freight.

Some ships carry the American flag through that canal, but they are mostly private yachts. A friend of mine who has just traveled around the world told me that he did not see the American flag once between New York and Hongkong, going by the way of the canal, until he reached the island of Ceylon, and then saw the flag of Mr. James Gordon Bennett's yacht. If the shipowners of the nations carry your grain and cargoes, they are going to carry them by routes and to markets which suit them, not the routes and the markets which are chosen by you.

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Probably they are more concerned than any other one class, and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertakings and take a wide national, nay, international, view of these great matters, feeling all the pulses of the world that beat in the great arteries of their own life and prosperity. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men, so that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that he deplored the nonexistence of an American merchant marine, and directs attention to the Panama Canal, which, he says, will allow the farmers to ship their products to the Pacific by way of Atlantic ports in coastwise steamers. He then points out that the House and Senate have passed a bill for free tolls for American ships through the canal and prohibiting ships owned by American railroad companies to operate through the waterway, declaring that everything done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer. He winds up by declaring that the platform is not molasses to catch flies, and that gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to private and quiet retreat.

Mr. Speaker, the following is the plank in the Democratic platform in 1912 relating to Panama Canal tolls:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by American railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Mr. Speaker, the speech above referred to was made at a time when Congress had been for weeks considering and discussing this great question. The newspapers of the land were carrying arguments daily both for and against the policy of exempting our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. A majority of the combined Democratic vote in the House and the Senate had declared for free tolls. Now, was Mr. Wilson voicing his convictions, after mature deliberation, on that day in New Jersey or was he extending a little of that molasses he spoke of for the purpose of catching the voting flies of the Nation?

Compare the language of his New Jersey speech with that of the remarkable message he delivered to Congress in person on March 5, 1914, in which he said, in part:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls. * * * In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901.

Now compare again, Mr. Speaker, the language just quoted with that of the British chargé d'affaires, A. Mitchell Innes, in a communication to the United States Secretary of State on July 8, 1912, in which he said, in part:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

This, Mr. Speaker, is as strong a statement as we could expect from the British authorities in substantiation of our position. It clearly shows that Great Britain recognizes the fact that we are at liberty under the terms of the treaty to exempt our coastwise trade. Inasmuch as the act exempting this trade exempts in no way United States vessels engaged in foreign commerce, but confines the exemption to only those vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade, it is difficult to comprehend how the President has reached the conclusion that this law is in plain contravention of the terms of the treaty unless his recent conversion has been expedited by pressure brought to bear by menacing foreign nations. He asks us to repeal this law, to reverse our action "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong," and then, in conclusion, says:

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

Mr. Speaker, I will include as a part of my remarks the following, which is a copy of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

The President of the United States; John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India; the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B. G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States, who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respect subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in the case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purpose of this treaty, and in time or war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal."

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ART. 5. The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

[SEAL.] JOHN HAY.
[SEAL.] PAUNCEFOTE.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which preceded the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which was ratified by the British and United States Governments on July 4, 1850, has been the cause of much of the misunderstanding relative to the rights of Great Britain under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It provided that the two nations contracted to insure the safety and the neutrality of the canal, wherever it should be built. It presupposed the construction of the canal by parties other than either of the two nations. At no place in the treaty was it even inferred that either of the two should alone construct the same. It simply assured the world that should any private company undertake to build the canal Great Britain and the United States would guarantee to protect the same during the process of construction and maintain its neutrality afterwards, provided equal treatment was given to all nations in the use of the same.

When, during the years that followed the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in 1850, it became apparent that the proposition was one of too great a magnitude for a private corporation to handle successfully, it was realized that if an isthmian canal was to become an accomplished fact it must be undertaken by either the British Government, the American Government, or by both.

The British Government not being willing to enter into the undertaking of a work requiring the great amount of capital necessary to insure its completion, and not being willing to assume the responsibility incident to the operation of the same; not being willing to take her chance of receiving dividends on the investment, nor paying her fair share of the deficit, should there be any; nor being willing to assume the responsibility of protecting the canal, entered into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with the United States, thereby relinquishing all rights she may have had under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This is shown definitely by article 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

Article 2 conveys to the United States authority to construct the canal, either directly at its own cost or in any other way it sees fit, and states specifically that the United States Government shall have and enjoy all rights incident to construction, as well as the exclusive right to provide for the regulation and management of the canal. The first paragraph in article 3 specifically states that the United States alone adopts the rules set forth in this article. The right of Great Britain to say what these rules shall be is nowhere set forth in the treaty. That is exclusively the right of this Government. Rule 1 provides:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations "observing these rules."

It does not say, as is so often misquoted in the newspapers and magazines of the land, that—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations.

Rule 3 provides that the—

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Rule 4 provides:

No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in the case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

Rule 5 provides:

The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

Did President Roosevelt, Secretary Hay, the Senate, or the House of Representatives ever understand that we were to be included among the "nations observing these rules"? If ever this country should become a belligerent, which God forbid, are we and our vessels of war to be bound by these restrictions? Are we to be bound not to coal our battleships in the canal or in any of the ports of the zone? Must our battleships seek for coal in the ports of a friendly nation when the coaling stations in the Canal Zone are closed against us? Can we not embark or disembark troops in the Canal Zone? Are our warships to be forbidden to remain longer than 24 hours within 3 marine miles of either end of the canal in support of the fortifications? Are our warships to be restrained from following the warships of a nation with whom we are at war for 24 hours, giving that warship an opportunity to speed along our coast and bombard our cities? I do not believe it was so understood by either the statesmen of this country nor those of England, who negotiated the treaty, nor by the Senate, which ratified it.

If rules 3, 4, and 5 are not to be observed by us, are we one of the nations observing these rules? Our warships could only be called belligerents when we are at war. We can not observe these rules while we are at peace because they do not then apply to us. We do not intend to observe them when we go to war; consequently, are we one of the nations observing these rules?

Mr. Speaker, the vessels of commerce and war are mentioned only in the one phrase. If the rules apply to our vessels of commerce, they apply likewise to our vessels of war. If we concede at this time the right of Great Britain to place her own construction upon this treaty, we concede for all time to come the fact that not only our vessels of commerce, but our vessels of war as well shall be absolutely on the same footing as vessels of war of all other nations, regardless as to whether we shall be at war or not. No other construction could well be placed upon the action of Congress on this question at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I am for America, not England, Japan, or Germany. I am an American citizen, and to vote at this time to give up to any nation in the world the rights that are clearly ours under this treaty would be to belittle my citizenship. I can not imagine a contingency, even if pressure were being brought by all the nations of the world, which could justify me in closing my eyes to the moral effect the recession from the ground we have previously taken would produce throughout the world. How long, I ask you, if we repeal this law under the present circumstances, would it be before Japan would be insisting upon her claimed rights on our Pacific coast? How long would it be before Germany or France or Russia would be making demands upon us which could not be met? I take it, Mr. Speaker, that had we a James Monroe or a Grover Cleveland in the White House to-day no such demand would be made of the Congress. It is gratifying to look back in American history and consider the men I have mentioned. The attitude of the President in this instance as compared to that of President Monroe is very striking indeed. At the time the latter served notice upon all the powers of the world of the adherence of the American people to the Monroe doctrine we were a nation of 10,000,000 people; to-day we are a nation of ten times 10,000,000 people. At the time Grover Cleveland served notice to England and Germany to get out of Venezuela or he would put them out we were a nation much weaker than we are to-day.

Mr. Speaker, the action that Congress takes upon this bill at this time will be taken for all time to come as the American construction of the treaty. It commits not alone this administration, but all administrations to come. If we relinquish our rights to-day, we relinquish them forever, and I appeal to every Member of this House to stand firmly for the United States and the American people. [Applause.]

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen on the other side are not prepared to put on any speakers to-night, and I am considerably ahead of them in time. If they are willing to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, I will ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is the Chair able to inform the House how the time stands?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen hours have been consumed. Five hours and twenty-seven minutes are left.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was more than that. How does the time stand between sides?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman would use 27 minutes now, I would be willing to wait until 12 o'clock to-morrow for the meeting time. We are that much ahead of the gentlemen on that side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has remaining 2 hours and 15 minutes; the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] has 19 minutes; the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] has 1 hour and 48 minutes; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. It appears, Mr. Speaker, that the opposing forces have considerably more time remaining than I have. If they would consume half an hour this evening, we would have five hours remaining to-morrow, and could probably get through by 5 o'clock. If they can not do that, I ask unanimous consent that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the House meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that most of the Members want to hear all of this debate. If we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow a great many of them, with their engagements made for to-morrow morning, would be prevented from being here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks the attendance here this evening indicates a very ravenous desire to hear? [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. I think it does. I have not missed a word of this debate myself, and I had wanted to hear it to-morrow, and I know a great many Members who are not here this evening who want to hear the debate to-morrow. I know a great many gentlemen have made arrangements for official business to-morrow that will not permit them to be here at 11 o'clock. I am just as anxious as the gentleman is to get through.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will withdraw his request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the situation is this: If we consume another half hour to-night, that would leave five hours, and we would not be detained here to-morrow late in voting. Otherwise we would have a late dinner to-morrow. That is all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that some arrangement will be made to have the hour of meeting to-morrow made earlier.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am just requesting that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The conference report on the urgent deficiency bill should be agreed to some time to-morrow. It affects the compensation of the employees on the Panama Canal, which, unless this bill be signed before Wednesday, must under the Panama Canal act be reduced.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. MANN. Under the order of the House could this conference report be taken up except by unanimous consent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had hoped that the House would dispose of the canal bill early enough to take up the conference report on the urgent deficiency bill. I hope that some arrangement will be made to permit the bill to be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the conference report may be taken up to-morrow after the canal bill is disposed of; but in all likelihood the canal bill will not be disposed of before 8 or 9 o'clock at night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is the conference report a complete agreement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a complete report.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Is it likely to lead to debate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we eliminated all the disputed items the last time the matter was under consideration.

Mr. MANN. I doubt whether you would save very much time by meeting at 11 o'clock. A majority of the Members of the House will not know that you are going to meet at 11 o'clock, and if there is nobody here at that time I shall feel it to be my duty to make the point of no quorum, in order to notify them. If gentlemen are notified, so that they are here in respectable numbers, that will be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I will request that we meet at 11.30 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he let the House meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin adhere to his objection?

Mr. COOPER. I object to 11 o'clock, but not to 11.30.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the House meet at 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can we consider the conference report that is now at the Clerk's desk except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. We can not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It could not be considered at 11.30 o'clock, because we can not act on it until after the Senate acts; and I will not ask to call up the conference report during the consideration of the canal bill.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. When this conference report was before the House a few days ago the controversy was over one item that was left in conference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has been settled in accordance with the action of the House.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be practicable to dispose of that conference report now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we have to wait until the Senate acts. We can not act until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet at 11.30 o'clock to-morrow.

There was no objection.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the author of peace and the lover of concord. Thou dost not withhold any good thing from them that walk uprightly. Thou hast called us into the more abundant life. All Thy ministries are vouchsafed to us that we may attain unto the high destiny of the sons of God. The gentle influences of nature about us, the refining forces of blessed friendships, the pursuit of the lofty ideals of life, all lure us to the high destiny of mankind. We pray that we may under the guidance of the Divine spirit fulfill all Thou hast committed to us of trust in life and at last come into the presence of the great judge of the universe with our work well done. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. THORNTON. In behalf of the Committee on Fisheries, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3362) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce, through the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars, rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas, and I submit a report (No. 396) thereon. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Texas to the report.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 3, 1914.

Hon. JOHN R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of February 18, you are advised that the department's indorsement of Senate bill 3362, providing for a survey of oyster grounds on the coast of Texas, was contingent on the granting of a special appropriation for the work, which can not be conveniently undertaken before the next calendar year owing to the obligations for oyster and other surveys which the department has already assumed. To make this point clear, it is recommended that the bill be amended as follows: In section 2, line 6, after the word "money," insert the words "hereafter authorized to be appropriated," and in line 7, after the word "act," add "which amount is to be available until used."

Very truly, yours,

ALBERT LEE THURMAN,
Acting Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were, in section 2, line 6, after the word "money," to insert the words "hereafter authorized to be appropriated," and in line 7, after the word "act," to add the words "which amount is to be available until used."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted an amendment providing that no appropriation in excess of $5,000 to be paid from the Indian funds, or which is reimbursable from Indian funds, shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior or by any other officer or agent of the United States, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL LANDS IN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I find there is considerable confusion in regard to the present status of the bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry. This confusion arises from the fact that there was, first, a substitute amendment agreed to by the committee. Then the bill was recommitted to the committee, and the committee recommended another amendment to the bill. Then there were further amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. In order to avoid confusion, so that Senators may see how the bill now stands, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed showing the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole in small caps and the pending amendment in italic.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 41, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 54, 55, 56, and 57, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "To reimburse the appropriations for transportation, subsistence, and medical supplies of the Army, amounts expended for the relief of destitute American citizens in Mexico, including transportation to their homes in the United States, $40,152.47"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$20,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In lieu of the sum first named in said amendment insert the sum "$3,668.75," and in lieu of the sum last named in said amendment insert the sum "$13,668.75"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert the sum "$14,675"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agfee to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 27 of the bill, in line 16, strike out the sum "$6.89" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$6.80," and in line 18 strike out the sum "$64,925" and insert in lieu thereof the sum "$64,925.09"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "opening," in line 5 of said amendment, insert the words "under the direction of the governor of the Panama Canal"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "construction," in line 4 of said amendment, insert the words "but not later than June 30, 1916"; and the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS S. MARTIN,
N. P. BRYAN,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN P. FITZGERALD,
C. L. BARTLETT,
FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for the adoption of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Virginia if, in a few words, he can state the differences between this conference report and the report formerly submitted by him?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The only differences are that the House of Representatives concurred in two Senate amendments, numbered 29 and 30, which eliminated them from the further consideration of the conference committee. Amendment numbered 29 appropriated $5,000 to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. That was a Senate amendment which we could not get an agreement on in conference, but the House itself concurred in that amendment.

Amendment numbered 39 is the appropriation of $7,500 to the father of the late Representative Pepper. The House concurred in that amendment.

The House receded from their disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 44. It seems that the House had made an appropriation of $30,000 for printing and binding for the Department of Labor. The Senate struck out $30,000 and inserted $8,000. When the conference report went back to the other House the House insisted on their amendment, so as to make the appropriation $30,000. That has been agreed to, making that appropriation $30,000 instead of $8,000.

Those are the only changes which have been made since the conference report was last before the Senate and approved by it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that the $5,000 appropriated for the Department of Labor remains in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It remains in the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I was not able to follow the report as read by the numbers of the amendments, I will ask the chairman of the committee if the conference committee has inserted any new legislation in the bill that was not considered by either House?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. None whatever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to an item in the Washington Post this morning which attributes to me an admission with reference to Prof. Johnson that I never made. The article states that I put into the RECORD an extract from Prof. Johnson's report on the toll question, and that subsequently I admitted he was in the pay of Mr. Carnegie.

I know nothing at all upon that subject. I made no such admission upon the floor. I have no knowledge on the subject. I do not know that he ever lectured. I simply do not desire to be quoted as making a statement upon the floor of the Senate with reference to Prof. Johnson that I never made, and about which I have no information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator if he is prepared to say that Prof. Johnson was not a lecturer as stated?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said I had no information at all on the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I assume if it was not true and was material at all that Prof. or Dr. Johnson would let it be known to the Senate through his friends.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply do not desire to be made a witness upon a subject about which I have no information. If there is some one who does know, the person who knows should be quoted, and not the person who said he did not know and does not know anything about it.

TREATY RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on next Tuesday morning, immediately following the disposition of the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks on the question of our treaty relations with Great Britain and the Panama Canal tolls.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Motion by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining from the further consideration of the bill (S. 4898) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium on the public domain, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has sent word to me that he is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and he desired that unanimous consent be asked that the resolution go over for the day without prejudice.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reference to this matter. My colleague is absent from the Chamber to-day on account of illness, but I rather hope that the resolution will be disposed of, notwithstanding his absence. I am for myself quite willing to submit the matter to the determination of the Senate now, with the single observation that in my judgment it is a grievous error to take this bill away from the Committee on Mines and Mining, where, as I think, it very appropriately belongs, and give it to the already overburdened Public Lands Committee.

I wish to say in this connection that on the very day upon which this matter last came before the Senate the Committee on Territories had under consideration a bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which looks to the disposition of certain public lands in the Territory of Alaska. No one seemed to think that it was inappropriate for the Committee on Territories to consider that bill. They have gone to work upon it thoughtfully, carefully, and they are about ready to make a report to this body. It is exactly as appropriate to take that bill away from the Committee on Territories as it is to take this bill away from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

I ask that the motion be given consideration this morning and that the Senate dispose of it simply because of the sincere desire I have to expedite the passage of the bill or the consideration of it, at least, by the Senate. I have no other desire with respect to its being held by the Committee on Mines and Mining. Obviously the committee did not feel like going into a consideration of the measure while this motion was pending here, and it was not before the Committee on Public Lands for consideration. If the motion had not been made, I undertake to say that the Committee on Mines and Mining would have had a report on it before the Senate by this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that, of course, if he objects to the resolution going over on the request of the senior Senator from Montana, we are prepared now to proceed with it; but I asked unanimous consent at the request of the senior Senator from Montana this morning. Does the Senator object to its going over?

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Utah asks on behalf of my colleague that it shall go over, as a matter of course I shall not press for action upon it to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to go on with it and consider it this morning, but the senior Senator from Montana telephoned and asked if I would not request that it go over for to-day, without prejudice, as because of illness he could not be present this morning.

Mr. WALSH. Of course if the Senator from Utah states the desire of my colleague in regard to the matter, I shall not insist.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that he is no more anxious than am I to have the bill disposed of, and I hope that to-morrow morning it will be considered by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in the earnest hope that this measure may be very soon disposed of. As a matter of fact, it ought to have been disposed of before this time. The Senator very justly remarks that while this motion is pending the Committee on Mines and Mining can not be expected to give it that undivided attention that it otherwise would if the motion were not pending.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that this is not primarily and solely the motion of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], but that the senior Senator from Montana acted upon instructions from the Public Lands Committee in presenting this motion to discharge the Committee on Mines and Mining, and I think that the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member, and to which I think this bill ought to go, ought to be prepared without any unnecessary delay, at least to submit this question to the Senate. I hope it may be brought up to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will go over, without prejudice.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4405) to provide for and encourage the prospecting, mining, and treatment of radium-bearing ores in lands belonging to the United States, for the purpose of securing an adequate supply of radium for Government and other hospitals in the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. FALL. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the calendar beginning with Order of Business 259, the bill reached when the calendar was under consideration on Saturday last, and that the Senate consider unobjected cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the request, Mr. President? What was the bill last considered?

Mr. SMOOT. Order of Business 259, being the bill (S. 690) for the relief of the Pacific Creosoting Co. It is the bill which was reached at the time the Senate adjourned on last Saturday, when we had the calendar under consideration under Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I must object to that. There are some pension bills on the calendar that I think are quite as important as any others which have been passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. We shall reach them in this way.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall not reach them in this way, because they have been passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. True, there are some pension bills which were passed over.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better take up the calendar in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as first in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinnibone Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that the bill may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TELEGRAMS OF SENATORS.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) limiting expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators was announced as next in order, and the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That hereafter no telegrams on official business or otherwise shall be sent or received by Senators at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have no objection, personally, to the adoption of the amendment; in fact, I am rather inclined to think that it would be very good legislation. I do not consider myself at liberty, however, as chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to accept the amendment, or perhaps even to vote for it, under the circumstances—I will think about that—because the resolution as returned from the committee was the deliberate action of the committee after very full consideration of the subject matter in all of its lights.

Mr. President, we discovered that the present condition of things was chaotic, to say the least about it. It all depended upon the construction which individual Senators gave to the phrase "official business." Some Senators considered everything which was not private and which was public in its character as official; for example, organizing propaganda for initiatives, referendums, recalls, primaries, or anything of that sort. That was one extreme. On the other extreme, some Senators—I for one—considered nothing official except such things as grew out of the necessary attention of the Senator to the business of the Senate—notifications concerning confirmations, correspondence about pending legislation, and so forth.

Between these two extremes senatorial opinion fluctuated very widely, and the expenditures fluctuated with the varying opinions. I will say, for example, that the Senator who spent least of those who spent anything at all was the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I believe he had spent in three months' time something less than a dollar; others of us had spent less than $5, while some expenditures had at times gone up to $30 or $40 in a day, and all that, and yet in not a single case did I find a telegram where, from the standpoint of some possible construction of the law, the Senator could not have thought himself at liberty to send it. Then we found some telegrams sent in cipher. Of course about them we could know nothing, and that abuse, of course, ought to stop; no Senator ought to send a telegram in cipher and mark it "official business," because if it is public business it ought not to be private. That is one reason why, and the next reason why is because there is no way of keeping tab upon it.

After going through the entire subject, we concluded at first that the best way was just to send a letter to each Senator asking him to come to the office, to look over his telegrams, and to accept the committee's construction of what "official business" meant; which was correspondence connected with legislation or executive business pending in the Senate; and then to take out of his own accord such telegrams as he thought did not harmonize with this construction, pay for them himself, and leave us to deduct that much and pay the balance out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Then, when we got to thinking about that, we concluded that that was an impracticable course of conduct; that we could not very well leave it in that way, as it would still be chaotic to a certain extent. Then representatives from the House Committee on Accounts came over here. They had had the same trouble. We held a sort of conference, and it was the consensus of opinion amongst us all that the best way was to reduce it to a definite amount, whatever that might be, and leave Senators free play as to the construction within that amount; but they were not to send any more. Of course, there is objection to that, and that objection is that during a particular three months, let us say—because we made these comparisons by the quarterly periods—Senator A might accidentally have an immense amount of official business and Senator B very little, while during the next quarter it might be the other way. So we concluded that it was better to have some fixed rule which would at least be a limitation upon the expenditure if it should not be anything else. Then, if it were the misfortune of a Senator to have during a quarter, or at some particular time, a great amount of official business, why, let it be simply his misfortune, and let it go at that.

Especially did we take this view on account of the fact——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire in a moment.

In view of the fact that the whole system had grown up by analogy with the franking privilege and by an order, it is true, of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, away back yonder—I have forgotten just when, but it was when Col. Bright was Sergeant at Arms—and it was indorsed by the Senate at that time, but it had never been a matter of law, never a matter of statute. So a Senator could not very well complain of a limitation upon the amount which he was permitted to expend for sending telegrams when it was doubtful whether he had any legal authority to expend anything at all. Now I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was about to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that this matter might well go over, with a view of trying to reach an amicable understanding. I have no disposition to press my amendment as against the wishes of other Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather that it did not go over, Mr. President, because we have given to it the best judgment we had. By clash and counterclash of opinion we came to the conclusion that this was the most practicable and best way to meet the difficulty, and I do not think we would come to any different conclusion.

If the Senate should take the view of abolishing the whole business, that will be a conclusion of it. Some conclusion of it ought to be arrived at for another reason, if the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, and that is this: Frequently it is not the big things in the world that render people dissatisfied with government; it is the little things; and even where a Senator in absolute good faith has spent a large amount of money in the way of telegraphing at the expense of the Government there is frequently an opportunity for a lot of muckraking about it that would reflect not only upon him, when perhaps he ought not to be reflected upon, but upon this entire body.

It is infinitely better to do away with the whole thing than it is to leave it in its present condition. In my opinion, however, and in the opinion of the committee, it will be better simply to limit the expense to a certain amount of money each year, and let it go at that. That was what was done with stationery. Early in the history of the country Congressmen and Senators got all the stationery they wanted, provided they just said they wanted it for official purposes. Later on that was fixed at a certain amount; and it is well enough to treat this matter in the same way.

Mr. GALLINGER. The other suggestion I was about to make—and of course that I can do of my own volition—is that, in view of certain representations that have been made to me by Senators on both sides of the Chamber that there ought to be some allowance for telegrams sent on official business, I desire to withdraw the amendment I offered. The committee has given this matter great consideration, and the Senate can decide what amount is proper. If they do not think the amount fixed by the committee is the proper amount, it can be amended in that particular. Therefore I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that by reference to the RECORD it will be found that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has offered an amendment to the text of the resolution, which should have been considered first.

Mr. WARREN. My understanding is that there are other amendments, as the Chair has stated, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire was in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, that being true, it is not in order until the first matter is perfected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is just what the Chair was saying.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the Senator, he has withdrawn his substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know there was any other amendment pending. I had quite forgotten it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may be just as well withdrawn now as at any other time.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] offers the following amendment:

Add at the end of the resolution the following words:
"Any excess of this amount shall be charged to and paid for by Senators."

So that, if amended, the resolution will read:

Resolved, That the expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators on public business, payable out of the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and is hereby, limited to a sum not exceeding $60 per annum for each Senator. Any excess of this amount shall be charged to and paid for by Senators.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will pardon me, upon consultation with one of the members of the committee, the only one within my reach just now [Mr. SHAFROTH], I am inclined to think that the amendment, or some amendment to that effect, will not change the nature of the resolution to such an extent that we could not afford to accept it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I think, has an amendment intended to accomplish the same purpose in a different way.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. Then I desire to explain the difference between my amendment and the one offered by the Senator from Wyoming and see if the Senator will not accept it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand this is a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a substitute for his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] proposes to insert the following words:

Any excess of this amount shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the several amounts so paid shall be collected from the Senators sending the telegrams in excess of the $60 per annum, and said amounts so collected shall be credited to the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The object of that, Mr. President, is this: As long as Senators have to pay for official business they ought to have the official rate. That being the case, the amount in excess of $60 should be at the official rate, and then should be charged to the contingent fund, and when collected from the Senator the fund should be credited with the amount. It does not in the least change the amount of $60, but it does give to each Senator who uses the telegraph for official business the right to the official rate providing the amount is over $60. I think every Senator is entitled to that.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How does that change it?

Mr. WARREN. According to my amendment, as the Senator from Mississippi has said, it is so that the Senate can go on without the amendment if the Committee on Contingent Expenses will do as it has done heretofore; that is, when a Senator has exceeded what the committee thought to be right, or has used the frank for telegrams that were not thought to be official, they have collected the charge for such telegrams from the Senator sending them, and the money has been returned to the fund. Now, I have no pride of language, and I am perfectly willing to accept the substitute if the chairman of the committee in charge of the matter is willing to accept it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At first blush the objection that occurs to my mind anent the substitute is that it would involve some bookkeeping upon the part of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. It would be done in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; there is no difference as regards bookkeeping between my amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. The only difference is that if a Senator exceeds the $60, under my amendment he is entitled to the official telegraphic rate, and then he has to pay it to the contingent fund exactly the same as under the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When we audit the account we will allow only the $60?

Mr. SMOOT. Only the $60.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not see the least bit of difference between the amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to withdraw my amendment in favor of the other, because it makes no earthly difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I am willing that it shall take that course.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I observe that the resolution, as I understand it, provides for a flat rate. I wondered if the committee could not induce the telegraph company also to provide a flat rate, so that when we send a message from here to Idaho it will not cost any more than a message from here to New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think we could do that unless we could change the whole method of doing telegraphic business in the United States. That would be a matter that ought to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, I think.

Mr. BORAH. It occurred to me, for instance, that a Senator could send four messages from here to Boston for the amount for which a Senator from Idaho could send one message home to Idaho.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true, Mr. President; but we all have occasion every day to thank God for the existence of the law of compensation. While in that case the rule as to telegrams would work unfairly against those living very far from Washington, the rule as to mileage and some other things work unfairly toward those who live very close to Washington; and the whole thing evens itself up in the long run.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that while there are inequalities in the amounts each shall pay, there are also inequalities as to every State. Take New York, with her seven or eight million people: Of course, the Senators from that State would require more telegrams than the Senators from Idaho would require; and although the distance is a great deal shorter and the amount of expense incurred for each telegram is a great deal less, yet the telegrams in the gross amount would come to much more than those which would be necessarily sent by the Senators from Idaho. We have the same system as to stationery, and it seems to me that would be a proper rule to adopt as to telegrams. In the matter of mileage, the long distance also compensates Senators from the far-off States and gives them an advantage over the Senators from the near-by States. The committee took all those matters into consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. There is no occasion for the Senator from North Dakota to yield to me. I have the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I had the floor a long time ago——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I have been yielding right along.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has not been recognized this morning.

I was going to say that there are disadvantages about the situation, some of which have been suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH]. Those things we have to take into consideration. If, however, we are going to have a flat rate here for Senators, I wish to suggest that the Committee on Contingent Expenses see if it can not do something to induce the Western Union Telegraph Co. also to establish a flat rate for Senators.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had hoped this matter would not be finally decided to-day. It came up suddenly before the Senate to be acted upon. This is the first time at least that I have heard that this was to be the limit. It may be my fault.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken about that. The matter has been up before, and was discussed for some time during the morning hour, and it has been upon the calendar quite a long while.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say I may be in error in that respect, but I am not in error in one thing, and that is that this is a most inequitable proposition. It does seem to me that the committee might work out something that would be more equitable toward all of the Senators.

Those Senators who come from, say, California would have to send perhaps 100 telegrams where the Senators from Maryland would have to send only one, simply because the Senators from Maryland have the telephone at their disposal; they also have the mails at their disposal, which will reach almost any part of their State in two or three hours at most, while the mails can not reach California under five or six days. Therefore, in the many investigations we are having, in connection with which our constituents are asking when it is necessary for them to be present, and telegraphing us to ascertain when this matter and that matter will come up, in nearly every instance we have to reply by telegraph. That is not the case with Senators who live near by. That is not the case in reference to New York; for although the number may be vastly greater, the facilities for reaching them in a very short time are very much better, so that we can not compare one with the other.

I myself may not be personally interested in the matter, because I do not think the amount I have sent in any year since I have been here will equal the maximum amount fixed in the resolution; but I can see that the Senators living in Colorado or in Idaho or in California, or in Nevada, even though that is a small State, would be at very much greater expense than those living near by; and there ought to be some method fixed by which these great distances, and the necessity that follows because of those distances of sending a great many more telegrams, might be equalized as between Senators.

I do not see any more reason why we should limit the amount to be sent for telegrams than why we should limit the amount of our postage, if it is strictly upon official business. I do not believe any Senator will knowingly abuse the privilege by sending private dispatches where he should send only public dispatches. If he does, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can bring the matter to his attention. I think it can be fairly left with him and to his honor as a Senator to send telegrams only in those cases in which it is necessary for him to use the telegraph rather than the Postal Service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon an interruption there for just a moment, the Senator says it would be easy, in case of conceivable abuse, if it were permitted, for the committee to check it by refusing to pay the expense incurred. I wish to say to the Senator that that could not be done except by the committee each quarter going over every telegram and reading it.

I have been upon this committee since I was a Member of the Senate, and never before has the committee been over the telegrams, and I dare say that in 15 years it has never been over them. This year, there being rather a heavy expense, we thought we would look through them. Certainly the committee could not be called upon to go through all the telegrams every quarter. It would take them three or four weeks.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that difficulty could be met very easily. I, for one, would be willing to vote the committee an extra clerk, whose only business would be to investigate that matter and give it his special attention, if the committee could not do it. I submit, however, that it is an injustice to say that all shall have exactly the same amount for telegrams, when we know that the telegrams of one Senator will probably amount to ten or twenty times as much as those that would naturally be sent by another Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to say in answer to the Senator, with relation to the determination of this matter now, that this is the third time it has been discussed in the Senate; and if we are going to dispose of it at all, it seems to me, it ought to be disposed of now.

With relation to the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota that there is inequality, there is to some extent inequality, but it is offset as against other advantages. For instance, the official rate from here to the Pacific coast is 2 cents a word for 20 words. The rate from here to New York is 1 cent a word. So the distance cuts a figure to a certain extent, but the amount in the gross is very much modified by the long distance. In other words, relatively, it is a great deal cheaper to send a telegram a long distance than it is to send a telegram a short distance. That is one of the compensations that come in. Of course, as long as we leave it to each Senator, they are going to have different views with relation to what is and what is not an official telegram.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to say just a word right there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The great inequality is not so much in the difference in the rate as it is in the difference in the necessity for using the telegraph service for the long distances.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is an element of that kind; but most of the matters that are sent by telegraph now could be sent by letter. For instance, where the nomination of a person is confirmed here, some Senators immediately send him a telegram; others write him a letter. There is no absolute necessity for sending the telegram; but those who send the telegrams put an additional expense on the Government, and those who do not send the telegrams really are acting in the interest of economy to the Government.

It seems to me as to the statement that Maryland is such a short distance away that that is a saving. A Senator from Maryland need not spend his $60 if he does not want to spend it. It is an over amount as to him, it is true; but he does not get it unless he sends telegrams to that amount. If letters answer as well, every Senator will send a letter in preference to a telegram. Therefore the Government will save on that instead of paying the full amount of $60. In other words, this is simply an amount that is fixed as a kind of average. It does not mean that every Senator is going to spend it, because the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] in three months sent only three telegrams, aggregating 76 cents.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator on that point allow a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. How much does the committee estimate will be the saving to the Government by the adoption of this resolution over the present practice? I suppose the committee went into that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, it is many thousands of dollars. The average of the amount for the three months was about $8 a month. The House committee thought it ought to be $40 a year. We thought it ought to be $60 a year. That is the amount we thought would establish a fair average; and we think that it will satisfy all the urgent needs.

Then, with the amendment which the Senator from Utah has placed on the resolution, it will give each Member, if he wants to spend more, the Government rate, whereas if that provision is not made he will have to pay the rate for individual telegrams, if a Senator sends it marked official business. If he can not mark it official business, after the amount of $60 is used up, he will have to pay the full rate, which will be $1 from here to the Pacific coast.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator tell us what the House of Representatives has done with this resolution?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know what they have done. They thought that we ought to take it up as a joint matter and put it through both Houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say, if the Senator will pardon me, the first suggestion reducing it to a fixed amount was made by one of the members of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And he wanted the amount fixed at $40.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At that time we were not ready to accept it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me we had better settle it now. With the amendment which the Senator from Utah has proposed it will give every Member the right to send a telegram even beyond the amount of $60 at the low Government rate, whereas if that amendment is not placed on the resolution I doubt very much whether he would have that privilege.

Mr. KERN. Assuming that the average amount heretofore paid is $8 a month, or $96 a year, I will state in answer to the Senator from Wyoming that the total amount saved by this arrangement to the Government would be $3,528.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution, but before it is acted upon I think the attention of the public ought to be called to the moderation with which this right has been used. We are agitating this question as if we were reforming a very great abuse. As a matter of fact, the report of the committee shows that this right given to the Senators has been used with extreme moderation, and that 9 Senators in the three months referred to did not use the right at all. The total number of telegrams sent by all Senators during the three months was about 4,300. Forty-three hundred telegrams in three months sent by 95 men, I think, shows that there has been practically no abuse of this privilege. The total charge to the Government, counting all possible abuses, amounts to only $10,000 a year. I think it is really a tempest in a teapot and there is actually no necessity for such a resolution at all.

As for my part, I do not believe in any one year of the five years I have sat as a Senator that I have used $10 worth of telegrams under this right, and most of the Senators who are here now can say about the same thing. I do not see any necessity for this action at all, and simply as a protest against the undue prominence given to the thing I will be willing to vote to table the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course if there has been any abuse of this privilege it ought to be corrected, but I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] that this is about the biggest tempest in the smallest teapot that I have witnessed for some time.

Let us take a few figures. Delaware has a population of 202,322. It is within four or five hours' ride. California has a population of 2,377,549. It is five days from Washington. Yet the committee, desiring to be entirely equitable in its treatment of Senators, gives to the two Senators from California $60 each to serve 2,377,549 people one year at a distance of more than 3,000 miles, and they give $60 each to the two Senators from the small State of Delaware, four hours' distant, to serve 202,000 people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is two hours' distant.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; it is probably two hours' distant. They allow the two Senators from New York in one year $60 each to serve 9,113,614 people. It seems to me—and I say it with all due respect—if this committee had sought to adopt some rule that would be as inequitable and as unjust as anything they could conceive, they could not have succeeded to a greater degree than they have.

I for one am in favor of tabling this resolution. We have devoted a great deal of time here to saving less than $3,000 a year.

For myself I have not taken the pains to inquire as to how many telegrams I have sent. The rule I have adopted for my own guidance is to send telegrams concerning public business just as when I was engaged in the practice of the law I would use the telegraph service to serve my clients. I use the mail when it would serve my clients as well. I used the telegraph when by so doing I could serve them better, all things considered. I do not believe the public expects the United States Senate to adopt any different rule.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that I think all time is wasted here that is spent in the effort to save money.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for just one moment?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to call the attention of the Senator, while on this phase of the subject, to the fact that the rule proposed by the committee only allows a Senator from California to send less than half the necessary telegrams to his constituents that it allows the Senator from Delaware to send to his.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Wyoming is exactly right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Only one-half of the information can be sent by telegraph by a Senator from California that can be sent by a Senator from a near-by State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Wyoming is not clearly right, if the Senator from Ohio will pardon me, because the very fact that Delaware is so close, the very fact that Maryland is so close, the very fact that Virginia is so close, leads those Senators to use the mail instead of the telegraph, and when they do it it does no harm to the man from California and the man from Wyoming. It merely saves that much of the public money.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But, Mr. President, the fact that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other word, and I will be through. This resolution does not give anyone, as the Senator from Ohio seems to think, $60 for use in California and for use in Delaware. It merely says that he shall have the special privilege, which the citizen of the United States generally has not, of using the telegraph free to a certain amount of money per annum. Then, if he does not use it and uses the mail instead, that does not hurt somebody at a distance, but merely saves that much money to the Government Treasury.

I will say that we found the chief abuse to be not so much in the sending of telegrams the propriety of which could be questioned under a proper construction of the law, but a disposition to substitute the telegraph for the mail in matters that ought to have been attended to by mail.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Granting all that the Senator says as to the difficulty, and the reason for some adjustment, the fact still remains that under the rule proposed by the committee if the Senate for the Senator from Delaware, or the Senator from New York, or the Senator from Pennsylvania, or the Senator from Virginia expends $60 in telegrams, the Senator from California can only send one-half the information for the same money that the Senator from Delaware or the Senators from these near-by points send, and therefore it is inequitable. I presume when the committee fixed the amount at $60 they felt that that was a fair average to which the amounts would probably go.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope that the Senator will not vote against the resolution. If he wants to amend it and make it a greater amount, I would be perfectly willing to do that. If he wants to make the amendment $100 for each Senator, I would be perfectly willing.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As far as I am concerned I do not want to change it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It ought not to be that a man can sit down and send telegrams without limit. Probably he may think that it is proper for him to do so in his official business, and yet another Senator would not think that it was official business at all.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I feel that if a Senator can not be trusted to send an official telegram or to judge of the telegram he may send as official, he is not fit to be a Member of this or any other body.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He would not have the right to pass on it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. With two others.

Mr. POMERENE. If I interpret what has been said correctly, without having the exact facts before me, I believe it to be the opinion of the committee that the instances in which the rule has been abused have been very exceptional if at all. For that reason I move to table this report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on tabling the resolution and the amendments. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). I desire to announce for the day the absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] and his pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. Not seeing that Senator in his seat, I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WORKS (when Mr. PERKINS's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of sickness.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent from the Senate on important business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted a moment ago, for the moment forgetting my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I inquire whether the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have a general pair with that Senator, and withhold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to ask whether the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a pair with that Senator. I find that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I will accordingly do that and let my vote stand "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 30, as follows:

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and accepted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the following words:

Any excess of this amount shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the several amounts so paid shall be collected from the Senators sending the telegrams in excess of the $60 per annum; and said amounts so collected shall be credited to the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is purely a business matter. If Senators are entitled to any expense money whatsoever in the sending of telegrams, they are entitled to have all their official telegrams sent free. If they are not entitled to have all telegrams of that official character sent free, they are not entitled to have any so sent. It is a very simple matter, it appears to me, to appoint one of the employees of the Senate as an auditor, just as any other business body would do, and to refer to such clerk the Senator's telegrams to audit. Such telegrams as are not upon official business can be paid for by the Senator. It is purely a simple matter; and to have a question of this kind debated, to a business man, I must say, seems rather remarkable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with what the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has said. The conditions which pertain to the official business of Senators are entirely different. The amount of telegraphing required by Senators dependent upon the distances they live from the Capital is entirely different; the rates of the companies are different. If it is proper for the Government to pay for any of this necessary telegraphing upon official public business, I think it is proper for it to pay whatever the Senator would otherwise have to pay. I think that consideration ought to be taken into further account. But in view of the difference in opinion which prevails here upon the various amendments, I move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not do that; it would not do a particle of good, unless the resolution were recommitted with instructions of some sort, for I am satisfied that the committee would bring back just exactly the report they did. I do not see any sense in recommitting the resolution. We have the matter here, and we might just as well dispose of it in one way or another. If Senators want the present condition to continue, then let it continue. If they want an end put to it and to have some order and regulation and limitation, let us do that.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] said that a man who was not fit to be trusted to judge in his own case as to whether he should or should not be charged for telegraphing was not fit to be a Senator. It is only necessary to say, in reply to that, that if that rule were carried out in attending to business of any description, every man would be left always a judge in his own case, and there would be no law and no regulation of any description anywhere. It is only necessary to add that Senators are no more saints than are others. So far as I know they are no better than the average citizenship of the same number. They are a good deal wiser and smarter and better informed, but certainly they are no more to be trusted as judges in their own cases than are any other human beings, and it has hitherto been considered, by the English-speaking race at any rate, a very unsafe thing to leave a man to be a judge in his own case.

I do not care what the Senate does with this resolution; it does not concern me in the slightest degree. I shall not send any more telegrams in the future than I have sent in the past. I do not send $10 worth in a year at the public expense. I believe in the old rule—whenever there is a matter of doubt, solve it against yourself. That is a safe rule in all business of every description when you want to be right. I repeat, this does not affect me in the slightest degree; I do not care a cent about it; but I do want it settled. We were upon the eve here some time ago of things that I wanted to avoid.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Mississippi takes his seat, will he inform me just what the saving will be under the estimate that he has made between the old method and the adoption of the new rule?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will tell the Senator from North Dakota frankly that I can not state accurately, but my recollection is that, taking the three months which we took as the subject of investigation—there were so many telegrams that we could not take longer than a one-quarter period—my recollection is that during that quarter the average had been $8 a month or $96 per annum, but that average was brought up by the fact that some Senators in some cases had seemed to substitute the telegraph for the mail to a very large extent. We concluded that an average, if it were brought down to where the telegraph had been used as a matter of necessity, in cases where the mail would not have done equally as well—and that is the rule a man would guide himself by if he had to pay for the telegrams—if it were brought down to that, $5 a month, or $60 a year, would be a fair amount to allow.

I did not, however, consider the question from the money standpoint so much. I do not care so much about the amount of the limitation as I do about the fact that there shall be a limitation; that there shall be a rule of guidance. Then Senators who wish to do so can send their telegrams up to that point. They will guide themselves by the fact that they have only that much leeway for free, unpaid telegrams, and they will be very apt to keep within it. My recollection is therefore that the saving would be about $4,000 per annum, but that is a mere guess; that is a mere impression, for I have not the figures before me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand from other Senators that if we were in session all the time, 12 months in the year, and were sending the average number of telegrams that were sent during the 3 months' period referred to, the cost would be about $3,500 more than it would be if there should be a limitation of $60 per annum on each Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A part of these three months was while the Senate was not in session. It was not this session; it was the quarter before.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; but suppose now we should in this way save $3,500 or $4,000 each session to the Government of the United States, who in the end would pay for that? Let me give one illustration to the Senator to show who would pay for it. Suppose that a Senator representing in part the State of Oregon has gone as far as his allowance will permit him to go; that there is before the Senate an investigation of some kind; and that there are a dozen different men in Oregon who will have to come here to be heard at that investigation. The Senator has not any idea in the world whether that investigation will commence at a certain time or whether it will last a week or whether it will last three months; he must inform his constituents who are to come here of the time when they might possibly be required to be present, and therefore he does not dare wait to send letters. He must have them come here perhaps a week or 10 days or 3 weeks or a month before, as it afterwards turns out, it is necessary for them to be here; and they are subjected to enormous expense while they are here, simply because the Senator does not have the right to use, according to his own judgment, the telegraph rates that are given to the Government or to have the messages charged to the Government. He may have to send a dozen such telegrams to different parts of his State; and why should he be forced either to pay the expense out of his own pocket or else compel his constituents to suffer this loss?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this resolution does not touch a case of that sort at all; it does not touch the question of Senate telegrams at all. In the case of such an investigation a committee of this body is carrying on the investigation. A committee carrying on an investigation by order of the Senate expends the money that may be deemed necessary, through its chairman, and the chairman of that committee can send any number of telegrams of that sort in the name of the committee. That is not the official business of a Senator; it is the official business of the Senate; and that is not touched by this resolution in the slightest degree.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would cost the same amount of money in either instance.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to recommit the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, just a moment. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me to offer an amendment in order that, if the resolution is recommitted to the committee, the amendment which I desire to propose may also go with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the resolution, to be known as section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the amount of mail matter which may be sent annually under frank by any Member of the Senate shall not exceed $600 regular postal rates, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is hardly germane; but I will say that I shall be very glad at any time if the Senator will manage to get that before the Senate. He has intended it as a joke, but really it would be very good legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Mississippi for the expressed and implied compliment which is carried in his statement; but if we are to deal with the subject of franks at all, let us take up the important feature of it, the one which does involve a consideration of great importance to the country, to the Post Office Department, and to the people of the United States, and deal with the question of the franking privilege of Senators in the mail.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that, as I understand, the franking privilege is fixed by law. The Senator does not intend to repeal that law by a Senate resolution, does he?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I made the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not hear the Senator do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the resolution is recommitted, I desire to present a substitute which I intend to offer, and which I hope may go to the committee with the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That hereafter no telegrams shall be sent by Senators at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not understand that, after a motion is made to recommit, further amendments can be offered, except by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They can not be offered except by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to recommit the resolution to the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with relation to pairs, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and in his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when the name of Mr. MYERS was called). My colleague [Mr. MYERS] is detained from the Senate to-day by reason of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], who is detained at home on account of sickness.

Mr. WORKS (when the name of Mr. PERKINS was called). I again announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] on account of sickness, and will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], with whom I am paired, not having voted, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as on the previous roll call and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on this ballot to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are unavoidably absent and are paired.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair between the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and to state that he has a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27, as follows:

So the Senate refused to recommit the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], as accepted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is a matter of indifference, I think, whether the Senate votes that it has a right to send official telegrams or whether it votes that it has not, as proposed by the Senator from Iowa. We may each have our preference in regard to it. I shall be content with either decision. I really do not see, however, why we should stultify ourselves by saying that we have a right to send $60 worth of official telegrams, but we have not a right to send $65 worth of official telegrams. That seems to me an impossible position.

If the Members of the Senate do not think they can trust themselves to send official telegrams which are official telegrams, then abolish the privilege altogether. If they think they can be trusted, then leave unlimited the privilege of sending all official telegrams, approved as official by the committee charged with auditing and controlling our expenses. To impose an arbitrary money limit, however, is not only inequitable as among Senators and States, but it seems to me to constitute an absurdity in itself to say that it is legitimate to send $60 worth of official telegrams, but beyond that limit it is illegitimate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May I inquire what the pending amendment is? I should like to have it stated. I was called from the floor, and do not know what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which is as follows:

Add at the end of the resolution the following words:

"Any excess of this amount shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the several amounts so paid shall be collected from the Senators sending the telegrams in excess of the $60 per annum; and said amounts so collected shall be credited to the contingent fund of the Senate."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And there is no amendment to that amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He said: "Why should there be a limit of $60 and not a limit of $65? Why should it be wrong to send telegrams"——

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President; the Senator does not mean to misstate me. I say, Why should there be any limit at all? The objection lies against any limitation. Let us abolish the privilege or keep it as it is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Exactly the same thing may be said as to the quantity of stationery to which each Senator is entitled, $125 worth. Why limit it? If official business requires a Senator to have more, why should he not have $500 worth? Why should he not have a thousand dollars' worth? Why should it not be unlimited?

We know that these things do lead to abuses, and consequently there ought to be a limit placed upon them. In this case, if the full amount is not used, of course it is for the benefit of the Treasury, and consequently it is in the interest of economy.

If it is used—if you take a fair average of the telegrams from past experience and say that that shall be the amount—it tends toward economy.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. FALL. Why is it that the Senate of the United States or any other governmental department can not do business as any other business enterprise does?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why is it that we limit——

Mr. FALL. I just want to refer specifically to the Senator's statement. There is no business enterprise that allows one of its employees or officials a stationery account and limits it, except by the auditor's limitation upon it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The answer to the Senator is that this is not a business transaction.

Mr. FALL. I see. This is not a business Government or a business department?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not a business enterprise. We are spending somebody else's money, and there should be a curb on it.

Mr. FALL. Oh, well, as a director of a corporation, you are spending the stockholders' money, too.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; but you have a direct interest in the amount that is expended.

Mr. FALL. Have you not, as a taxpayer, a direct interest in this amount?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; but the interest is so remote that it can hardly be taken into consideration.

Mr. FALL. Of course that is the theory we are drifting into.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Inasmuch as all of these telegrams are subject to criticism, and once in a while they are gone over, and they provoke to a certain extent slurring inferences, it does seem to me that in the interest of economy and in the interest of good feeling every Senator ought to be permitted to spend his amount without discrimination, which will save the examination of the telegrams and at the same time work for the harmony of the Senate. The fact that there is a limit here is not out of the way, because I have heard that large amounts of stationery were allowed for committees, amounting to hundreds and hundreds of dollars——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have voted with the committee in its efforts for economy and I have had much sympathy with the position it has taken; but if we put in this limit of $60 I have wondered whether that will not be construed by each Senator as meaning that there is that amount of money which he can spend, and whether he will not be induced to spend more than he otherwise would.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I think not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As far as I am concerned, I do not think this is such a precious privilege. I do not know how much I have expended on official telegrams, but I do not believe I have used $5 a year for that purpose. While I have no objection to important official business being sent at Government expense, I do not believe it is right to have this wide difference in the amount of money used by Senators, some Senators using hundreds of dollars and others not a cent, each representing an equally important State, and the public business being perhaps just as important.

I am prepared to vote out all appropriations for sending telegrams. Inasmuch as the point has been raised by Senators from States far distant from the Capital that this is a discrimination against them, I am more prepared to-day than ever before to vote that the mileage of Senators shall be confined to exactly the amount of money they spend in coming here and going back to their homes. All of these questions are related.

We have spent hours here to-day in discussing this question, when, it seems to me, it is selfishness that has actuated a large part of the argument.

I merely wanted to ask, however, whether making this limit of $60 and allowing that much to each Senator will not be an invitation to the Senator to spend $60, whereas now perhaps he is not spending one-quarter of that amount?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Allow me to ask another question. If the resolution offered by the committee is adopted, are we still going to audit the accounts, and are we going to confine the telegrams to official business, or does it mean that any telegram a Senator sends shall come within the $60 authorization?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I suppose it means official telegrams; but the Senator will realize that in determining whether a telegram is official or not men have different ideas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Just a moment; let me answer the question of the Senator from Michigan. On examining the telegrams that were submitted to us several members of the committee said that half of the telegrams were not official. Others said, "Well, under a liberal construction I think all of them are official."

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. There was a difference between us on that account, and this was a kind of compromise as to what should be done.

Replying to the question which the Senator asks, as to whether it would be an invitation——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to answer the Senator from Michigan for just a moment. He asked me two questions, and I am trying to answer them.

In answer to the question as to whether it is an invitation to spend more money than at present, it seems to me it is not. I believe Senators will be a little more careful in sending telegrams and will be a little more certain that their telegrams are official telegrams and will put a construction upon the matter that will be in the interest of economy.

I will state to the Senator that the very objection he made in the first instance was the one that impressed me in the committee more than any other, namely, that there is a great difference in the expenditure of Senators, one running away up and another running down to almost nothing, and that there should be a kind of equality as between them. It was on that account that we concluded it was fair to make this so that it should be an average amount, or nearly an average amount. Then, if a Senator wanted to send telegrams in addition to that, he would get the low Government rate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I was just going to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he did not think it might be possible for his committee to give a definition of official business instead of making this limitation, which seems to me entirely unjust.

I have no personal interest at all in the matter, because I am quite sure I have never sent anywhere near $60 worth of telegrams in any one year; but I can well understand how, under special circumstances and extraordinary conditions, such an amount might be very properly sent.

The Senator has referred to the difference of opinion which people have about what is official business. Why would it not be a good idea, instead of putting on this kind of a limitation, for the committee to take under consideration what is properly to be regarded as official business and make some little definition of it, so that there might be some guide to Senators?

I wish to say further in regard to the figures and facts that have been given here in regard to this matter, that, as I understand, they are all based on an investigation of the accounts for three months. The results that are obtained from three months' accounts are necessarily very unreliable. They may show that in those three months one Senator had a very large number of telegrams and another Senator practically none; but in the succeeding three months conditions may have entirely changed, and the Senator who had special business that occupied the attention of himself and his constituents during the first three months might be sending very few telegrams, and some other Senator might take his place in the expenditure.

Further, I wish to say that I agree with the idea that has been advanced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I believe that imposing a limitation of this kind will be, as time goes on, an invitation to Senators to spend up to the amount of that limit. I think in practice it will work that way.

So far as I am individually concerned, I have no interest at all in the question. As a matter of proper conduct of the business of this body, however, it seems to me a Senator should have official telegrams paid for by the Government; and if there is any question as to what are or should be properly regarded as official telegrams, it is a very proper subject for the committee to take up, and see if they can not define it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island will permit an interruption, he has said that he agreed with the Senator from Michigan that this might be regarded as an invitation to each Senator to spend the whole $60. There is at least this much of justice in that observation—that it is a permission, at any rate. I do not think it will operate that way. If, however, it did operate that way, there would still be less money paid out of the Public Treasury than there has been under the old system. Even if every Senator took advantage of it and each Senator sent $60 worth of telegrams, even though he had never sent any hitherto, there would still be less money spent than under the present system.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, if the idea the Senator is trying to incorporate into law by this resolution is for the sole purpose of saving money to the Government, then the proper way to save money would be to say that no Senator shall have any telegrams paid for. Either there is a propriety about certain classes of public-business expense being paid by the Government, or there is not. If official telegrams of any kind should be paid for by the Government, all should. The Government of the United States is not so impecunious that it can not afford to pay for the conduct of its own business. Therefore I do not see the force of that argument.

If the Senator wants to save money, and if it is a pure measure of economy, without regard to any principle that is involved, let us do away with the whole of it. If that is the case, I do not object; but I think the line that is being drawn is very improper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi was not trying to put the matter upon that plane. It had already been put upon that plane. The objection was made that more money would be spent, because each Senator would take it as an invitation. I had already distinctly stated that my main object in this matter was not the mere saving of the amount of money; but I was replying to this objection by saying that even from that standpoint the objection was not good, because it would not result in spending more money.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, at one end of the Capitol we have under discussion to-day free tolls. At this end of the Capitol we have under discussion free telegrams. God save the country! [Laughter.]

I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, before the expiration of the morning hour, I shall introduce a bill limiting to $600 the amount of mail matter which may be sent by any Senator or by any Member of Congress. As is well known by every Member of Congress and by the public generally, a great abuse has been practiced for many years in the matter of sending through the mails, free of charge, subject matter which is not of great interest to the public generally. I can not understand why a limitation should be placed upon communications by telegraph, which are in their very nature urgent, and relate to matters of public importance, while no limitation is placed upon the use of the franking privilege to send seeds and public documents through the mail, when many of those public documents are not of great interest to the public. I believe a real reform can be worked out in that line.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Mr. FALL. Is the Senator going to judge for himself whether the public documents are of interest to the public, or is he going to submit the matter to the judgment of the public?

Mr. ROBINSON. Heretofore I have not been in the habit of exercising much discretion in the matter of the documents I have been sending through the mails; but if a limitation is to be placed upon the amount that may be sent by any Member of Congress, I shall send only my speeches and remarks, which are always of great interest to the public. [Laughter.]

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 120.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 120) to provide for the inspection and grading of grain entering into interstate commerce, and to secure uniformity in standards and classification of grain, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] intended to address the Senate upon the bill at this hour. A few minutes ago he came to me and said he was not feeling well, and he desired that the matter might go over, at least so far as he was concerned, until to-morrow, when he would be prepared to speak. At that time, I understand, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will also desire to speak upon the subject. I am not certain whether the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is ready to go on to-day. If not, I have no objection to the bill being laid temporarily aside for the continuation of business on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it understood that it is to be laid aside without prejudice, and continue to be the unfinished business?

Mr. SMOOT. Providing we take up the calendar in regular order and consider cases to which there is no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we are going to return to the consideration of the calendar, I want to return to it where we left off and continue until we reach a vote on the question we had before the Senate. I would make objection to any unanimous consent that would prevent the regular order. If the request is to waive the unfinished business and to return to the calendar, I am willing to do that, if when we return to the calendar we return to it in regular order just where we left off.

Mr. SMOOT. That is satisfactory, providing we enforce Rule VIII.

Mr. GALLINGER. Rule VII?

Mr. SMOOT. Rule VIII, as to five minutes' debate. I have not asked the Chair to enforce that rule this morning, but I felt like doing so a number of times.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish the Senator had.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator from North Dakota does not want to have the unfinished business displaced, and if we agree now that we will take up the calendar in its order, where we are at the present time——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. Under Rule VIII.

Mr. BRYAN. Where we left off.

Mr. SMOOT. And consider it under Rule VIII, I believe we could proceed with the calendar and not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will have to get the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay the unfinished business aside.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Or it will have to be proceeded with or displaced.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to ask this unanimous consent: I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside to be become the unfinished business to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. To remain the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. To remain the unfinished business, and to be taken up again to-morrow at 2 o'clock. I do not wish a motion or anything else to displace the bill as the unfinished business. I do not want to put myself in the position of having some one move afterwards to proceed to another measure and have that motion then construed to mean that if what is taken up is not finished to-day it displaces the unfinished business. Why may we not make an agreement—and I do not care about the wording of it—that for the accommodation of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Massachusetts the unfinished business may continue as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, no matter what intervenes? That is all I ask.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator a question. How long does he expect to continue the discussion of this measure and to keep it before the Senate as the unfinished business? I have in charge a joint resolution providing for a constitutional amendment that I wish to bring up.

Mr. McCUMBER. Until we get a vote. The Senator from Minnesota would have spoken on it to-day had it not been for his illness. I understand that there will be three or four Senators who desire to speak and that we will be able to go right along with it after to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It must not be understood that the Chair is ruling now——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside, but I do not concede that unanimous consent will impress upon it any condition with reference to to-morrow other than that which it would have by reason of being the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all I ask.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator asks that, regardless of what we may do to-day, it shall be the unfinished business, and to that I object.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the unfinished business can only be displaced on motion, and if it is laid aside by unanimous consent temporarily it can still only be displaced on motion. If it is displaced on motion, it is always open to make a motion to replace it, but if unanimous consent is given to lay it aside temporarily it still retains its right as the unfinished business unless displaced by a motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. By what kind of a motion?

Mr. LODGE. By a motion to proceed to the consideration of some other bill after 2 o'clock. Nothing the Senator can do will protect it from that motion. It is utterly impossible to protect it from that motion except by unanimous consent that no one will make the motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Massachusetts consider that when a measure is the unfinished business and has been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, and then the Senate proceeds to the consideration of another measure——

Mr. LODGE. On motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When it proceeds to the consideration of the other measure on motion, and then that measure has not been finished at the time the Senate adjourns, thereby the unfinished business has ceased to be the unfinished business?

Mr. LODGE. Beyond any question. The fact that it has been laid aside by unanimous consent does not protect it from a motion to proceed to the consideration of another measure. It never can be protected from that that I can see.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Under the present rule I think——

Mr. McCUMBER. But there can be unanimous consent given to take up a bill at a certain time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from North Dakota, therefore, if that is the rule of the Senate at present, would not be safe in getting unanimous consent simply that this measure be temporarily laid aside. He would have no assurance that it would remain the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. He would have no assurance that a motion would not be made. He has no assurance now that a motion will not be made. Nothing can prevent a motion being made if a Senator chooses to make it, and if it is carried it displaces the unfinished business when not finished before adjournment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose the Senate gave unanimous consent that, if a motion were made and carried to proceed to the consideration of another measure after the unfinished business had, by unanimous consent, been temporarily laid aside, it should not operate to displace the unfinished business, would not the unfinished business remain then the unfinished business by unanimous consent?

Mr. LODGE. I can not see how unanimous consent of that character could possibly be obtained, because the maker of the motion would certainly not assent to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see the difficulty the Senator from North Dakota would have in obtaining it, because it would be objected to.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senator in charge of the unfinished business never has his rights impaired, because he can always make a motion to restore it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course he is not deprived of the right to make a motion, but the fact is the measure has ceased to be the unfinished business, and by his motion he is trying to regain the position which he has lost.

Mr. LODGE. The mere fact that it is the unfinished business gives him no protection. Whether it is laid aside temporarily or whether it is not, it is always open to be set aside on motion, if the Senate wants to do it. It is equivalent in many cases to the defeat of a bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is just what I understand, and what the Senator from North Dakota understands.

Mr. LODGE. You can not avoid it by any agreement that can be devised. I think the agreement is an impossible one.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then the Senator from North Dakota proposed an impossibility, and the impossibility was unnecessarily objected to, for there is no danger from that unanimous consent, and the only safety for the Senator from North Dakota is to go ahead with the unfinished business now. I shall object to temporarily laying it aside, if that is necessary to secure it in its place as the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota has left the Chamber on account of illness. I could not take up the bill and press it to a vote to-day under the circumstances. That being the case, I can only depend upon the courtesy and the good will of the Senate by extending this courtesy to the Senator from Minnesota, to bring it up immediately, as though it had never been laid aside at the time when it would properly come up as unfinished business. Relying upon that, I shall ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may now be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. All that I could do, then, would be to have a page call the Senator from Minnesota and continue with remarks upon the bill until he can come in. He does not wish to come here while he is sick. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his objection under the circumstances. I told the Senator from Minnesota that I would not during the day press the measure, and that I would see he had a chance to make his address to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is relying upon a broken reed if he is putting any confidence in the action of the Senate that by agreeing by unanimous consent to lay aside the grain-inspection bill temporarily it can remain the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I am not depending upon that, because I am depending upon my ability under the circumstances to make it the unfinished business at a future time.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me? If it should so chance that a motion is made to proceed to some objected bill upon the calendar, and his bill is thereby displaced, he can make the motion at 2 o'clock to-morrow to take it up, and there is not any doubt that the Senate would recognize his right to do so and it would not be allowed to be set aside. The Senator is entirely protected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think there is any Senator here——

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that it is needless to snarl up the bill by a point that is of no practical importance.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know whether I shall vote with the Senator for his bill, but in ordinary fairness he is entitled to have a vote upon the measure. It has always been the custom of the Senate when a Senator is sick that some arrangement is made whereby advantage shall not be taken of his absence. If there is a request for unanimous consent to proceed, we will say, with the Calendar of Unobjected Cases, I think the Senator is perfectly safe. I do not believe that any Senator is going to move to take up any other bill in the place of the unfinished business.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Maryland, who is now present in the Chamber, if he is ready to go on to-day with his argument against this measure?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have been absent from the Chamber, and I do not know what is before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. The unfinished business, the grain-inspection bill, is now before the Senate. I desire to know if the Senator is ready to go on and discuss it or if he is ready to have a vote taken on it?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I shall offer no objection, as far as I am concerned. Just as I came in I understood the Senator from North Dakota to state that the Senator from Minnesota wants to speak upon the bill and that he is absent. It does seem to me that privilege should be accorded him. I do not know that I exactly understand the status of affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is opposed to the pending bill. He is unavoidably absent from the city, and will be so until Thursday next. This matter was talked over before he left and it was thought probably a vote could not be reached anyway until Friday. I certainly, under the circumstances, will resist as far as I can, this measure coming to a vote before Friday. I can not see how the Senator from North Dakota is going to lose any of his rights even if there shall be an effort made to bring up some other matter. If his bill is going to be pressed to a vote before Senators who have expressed a desire to be heard upon it are given a chance——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator understands that I want to give the absent Senators a chance to be heard upon the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I so understand it. I hope the Senator will consent that it be at least laid aside, because the Senate has several times expressed itself in favor of giving the Senator from North Dakota an opportunity to bring his measure to a vote, and that opportunity will be given I have no doubt. We can proceed to the calendar and accomplish something to-day, and the pending bill should be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that so far as I am concerned, if the privilege be granted and the time be extended so that those who wish to be present may be here, I would be the last one to prevent him from bringing the bill to a vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the bill of the Senator from North Dakota in its present form, and I should like to have an opportunity to speak very briefly in regard to it. I am not prepared to do it to-day, but I can assure the Senator from North Dakota that if by motion his bill should be displaced I will vote with him at any time to take it up and make it the unfinished business. Our usual practice here, as the Senator knows, has been that when it is impossible to go on, as it is to-day, with the unfinished business it has been customary to lay it aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am relying upon that.

Mr. LODGE. If it were displaced by a motion accidentally, the Senate always gave the Senator in charge of the unfinished business the right to which he was entitled.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator understands that I have asked for unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that fully.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have asked unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and I hope under the circumstances, on account of the illness of the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator will not object to its being temporarily laid aside.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to suggest that I have had at least 22 years' experience in this matter—I have participated in, indeed, 23 years' experience—and I have never known an instance where a Senator lost his status by temporarily laying aside a bill. Everyone was willing to put it back on the calendar, and if there is any trouble to-morrow we will all agree to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I renew my request, Mr. President, that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, other Senators have been afforded an opportunity to express their views upon this question, and I want to say a few words. If I understand it correctly certain Senators and the Chair itself are of opinion that when the unfinished business has been temporarily laid aside and the Senate afterwards on the same day proceeds to the consideration of some other measure——

Mr. LODGE. On motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On motion—that that of itself does not displace the unfinished business. Now, whatever may be the firmness of the opinion of some Senators, that if that be done the Senator will not be deprived of his right to commence de novo and move to proceed to the consideration of his measure, and get it back into the position of unfinished business, is of no relevancy, in my opinion. Of course, the Senator can make the motion again to proceed to its consideration; and if done at the proper time and it is not finished on that day, it becomes the unfinished business. But that is not the point.

There is confusion on this subject, and some day it will result in great trouble here in this body, and it ought to be settled one way or the other. I do not wish in any way to embarrass the Senator from North Dakota. My position on this matter is not taken with any reference whatever to the merits of his bill. If the Senator from North Dakota is willing to take the chance of his bill being displaced by the Senate this afternoon proceeding to the consideration of another matter, I am perfectly willing he shall take the chance. I do not think there is any doubt that he could get it back again; but I think he is taking a chance.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question in connection with what he has just said?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to argue it was held that, if the unfinished business had been temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent and a motion was made during the time it was temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, it would not displace it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I said just the other way.

Mr. LODGE. We then agree entirely, because my position is that a motion to proceed to other business affects the unfinished business in exactly the same way, whether before the Senate or temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent, it makes no difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair make a suggestion? There seems to be a unanimous desire upon the part of the Senate that the Senator from North Dakota shall not lose the precedence of his bill as the unfinished business, and all the Senators present say that their purpose is that he shall not lose it. Now, why may not the bill be laid aside temporarily by unanimous consent, with the understanding that if any business intervenes prior to adjournment to-night the Senator from North Dakota will move to take up his bill, and that will make it the unfinished business again? All the Senators seem to agree that that shall be done.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair makes this statement only in the interest of economy of time.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair has stated the case exactly.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the consent of the Senator from Connecticut I will make merely one observation. This is not a new question. I once had charge of a very important measure—I once had charge of a very important measure before the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] entered the Senate—and I recall that I had on three or four different occasions to move to proceed to the consideration of that bill. It has never been questioned that a measure taken up by motion displaced the unfinished business, and I am very much surprised that at this late day it should be raised. The Senator from Connecticut is so insistent upon it that he has offered a rule, a proposed rule which is now before the Committee on Rules, and I beg of him to wait until that committee takes cognizance of his proposed new rule and makes a report on it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As far as any action on the rule is concerned, I suppose in regular order I shall wait until the committee has acted on it, and I thank the Senator for calling my attention to it. But that is not the question here at all. As to any suggestion of the Chair that there shall be an understanding that the Senator from North Dakota may later on move to proceed to his measure again, I do not think there is any necessity for an understanding. That is his right under the rule.

Mr. LODGE. It is merely in the nature of a notice that that is what he is going to do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Chair's suggestion went further than that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The suggestion was not made as to the right under the rule, but as to the general understanding from the discussion which has taken place.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What the understanding is now will hardly have much weight upon the proceeding when the Senator from North Dakota rises to-morrow morning and finds that something else is the unfinished business on the calendar and that his bill is relegated to the numeral from which it was rescued when he made it the unfinished business. Then, if he wants to put the Senate to a test as to whether they will displace their later action by what he got the Senate to take up on a prior day, that is his privilege. He can place himself in that situation if he wants to do it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought I had it, but I realize——

Mr. WARREN. I will ask both Senators to yield to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. WARREN. On Saturday the Senator from North Dakota temporarily laid aside this measure. Unanimous consent was given that we should commence at a certain point on the calendar and proceed with only the unobjected cases. I should like to make such a request for unanimous consent now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am sorry; but if the Senator couples that with the idea that we are to consider only the unobjected cases, I shall be forced to object. I have no objection to returning to the calendar, but I want Senate resolution 156, upon the consideration of which we were engaged at 2 o'clock, to be continued.

Mr. WARREN. My only reason for proposing the request was that we would probably get through the entire calendar of unobjected cases, and then we would have the number of cases on the calendar reduced very much.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would agree to that, but this resolution has been before the Senate twice, and the entire morning hour has been taken up discussing it both times. It seems to me that it ought to be voted upon. I think as chairman of the committee I am by duty compelled to object to any unanimous consent that would prevent its consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota if he wants to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and it is a part of the unanimous consent that the matter the Senator from Mississippi was in charge of at the time the hour of 2 o'clock arrived shall be proceeded with until disposed of, I shall not object to that request. Then, if the Senate wants to proceed to the calendar under Rule VIII or otherwise, it can take its own course. But I think inasmuch as the Senator from Mississippi was taken off his feet at 2 o'clock and his matter was not determined, if we are going to do anything with the calendar, in justice we ought to recur to the subject from which we were dismissed by the measure of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota to put his request for unanimous consent in that form.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say in answer to the Senator from Connecticut that I am placed in this position not of my own volition, but due to the sickness of a Senator who expected to speak on the bill to-day, and I am in duty bound under the circumstances to protect his interest and his rights. If it is necessary in order to do that that I jeopardize the bill in any way I must jeopardize it rather than take advantage of his absence. With that understanding and with the hope that we may now get an agreement, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside that the Senate may proceed with the discussion of Senate resolution 156, which was under discussion when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Much as I regret, I shall be obliged to object to any such unanimous consent. I desire to have it understood that as soon as the bill of the Senator from North Dakota is temporarily laid aside, if it shall be, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4405, the public importance and the urgent character of which I endeavored to impress upon the Senate at least 10 days ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill is that?

Mr. WALSH. The radium bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not believe any harm will be done by the course I suggest, because I believe that to-morrow morning when the Senator moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill it will be proceeded with. I will vote to do it. I know Senators who are opposed to the bill say they will so vote. I therefore move now that the Senate proceed to continue the consideration of Senate resolution 156.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Will not the Senator from Mississippi withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will withhold it a second.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me make this request of Senators that they will allow me to lay aside this bill temporarily without any conditions whatever on account of the sickness of the Senator from Minnesota, and then that the Senate do as it sees fit, and I will take my chances.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCUMBER. So, Mr. President, I will modify my several previous requests for unanimous consent and simply ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be now temporarily laid aside.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire whether the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is in order or whether the business before the Senate is the request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the request for unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the bill referred to by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is temporarily laid aside.

TELEGRAMS OF SENATORS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move that the Senate proceed to continue the consideration of Senate resolution 156.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a question of order; that there is no such motion as the Senator from Mississippi has made or attempted to make—"to continue the consideration."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will word it in a perfectly parliamentary way—"to proceed to the consideration"——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is better.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Instead of "continue the consideration." I was merely trying to speak good English, because we have been considering the resolution, and I thought it was good English to move to "continue" its consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The motion which the Senator has now made is good parliamentary law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 156.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and accepted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I can not support the amendment, because I do not believe in it. In substance it is giving Senators rebates on their telegrams, and I do not believe that is a sound principle. The proposition is that if more than $60 worth of telegrams are sent in a year, that excess, whatever it may be, shall be paid for by the Senators at the Government rate, and the question as to what is official business and what is not official business will not be decided.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas is wrong in that, for the resolution itself, as the Senator will see if he will examine it, applies to public business. I would not want the Senator to think that I would offer an amendment that would allow Senators to send such telegrams as they may see fit, of a personal character, and have them charged to the contingent fund of the Senate in order that they may get the governmental rate. I will call the Senator's attention to the wording of the resolution.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand it perfectly; the Senator need not read it; I know exactly what it means; and if the Senator will permit me to go on, I will explain to him just what the effect of it will be.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, this controversy came up because of a difference of opinion in the committee, as has been suggested by the Senator from Colorado, as to what is official business. Telegrams have been sent in some instances which members of the committee think were not official, and should not be paid for by the Government, but should have been paid for by the Senators themselves. I could illustrate it by reading telegrams, if I were disposed to do so, to show what different conceptions Senators have as to what is "official business." Because of the difficulty in fixing a rule that should be applied in auditing these accounts, this system of limitation was suggested. I acquiesced in it, because I do not believe that there is any occasion for using more than the amount suggested by the committee on the part of any Senator; so I think it does not abridge the rights of any Senator. Therefore I shall oppose this amendment because, in my opinion, there is no occasion to use more than $60 a year for sending telegrams; and if a Senator does use more, I think he ought to pay for them.

I should very much prefer to abrogate the system altogether, because I think in a few instances it has been abused, and I think it will be abused under the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. If Senators send the same kind of telegrams which in a few instances have been sent in the past, and follow the same practice, there will be cases where more than $60 will be used, in my opinion, not on official business, but on private political matters. I am not going to consent to any amendment being adopted in this Senate which would authorize any Senator to spend excessive amounts for telegrams which are political, and not official, and then get a rebate from the telegraph companies because he happens to be a Senator. That is exactly what the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I certainly think the Senator from Kansas is mistaken in his construction of the amendment which I have offered; and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the particular wording of the resolution and of the amendment. The resolution provides:

> That the expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators on public business, payable out of the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and are hereby, limited to a sum not exceeding $60 per annum for each Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what is "public business"?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, "public business," as the expression is here used, means any business that a Senator may have as a Senator of the United States that affects the public interests—not his private interests, not a political question, but a question involving a public matter which is before the Senate or before the other House or before a department.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is the Senator's interpretation of "public business," but suppose that there was pending in one of the States a question of amending the State constitution, so as to provide that Federal judges should be nominated by the citizens of the State in the primary election, instead of being nominated on the recommendations of Senators. Does the Senator think that it would be "public business," under his interpretation, to send any amount of telegrams to newspapers, containing articles in favor of this policy or that policy, on the part of the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose that a majority of the committee should say that that was "public business"; then such telegrams would be paid for, would they not, under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the question of the Senator, I will say that the amendment which I propose would not change that one particle.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly what I am objecting to.

Mr. SMOOT. The question of what is "public business" must still rest with the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. If I were a member of that committee and there was a telegram which had been sent, which was purely personal, upon a personal matter, in auditing it I would not allow it to be paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate.

What I want to accomplish by the amendment is this: If there happens to be some question in which the constituents of a Senator are deeply interested, the Senator being so far away that it would not be possible to write a letter and receive an answer in time to be of use to them, the Senator shall be in such a position that, if the cost of his telegrams shall be more than $60 a year, so long as they are on official business, he shall have the official rate. That is all the amendment proposes.

Mr. BRISTOW. A Senator has that right now, has he not?

Mr. SMOOT. He would not have that right under the resolution without the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, I know; but at present a Senator has that privilege under the practice of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Utah does not change the present status at all by his amendment. His amendment simply takes out of this committee proposition all there is in it, so far as changing the practice of the Senate goes.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; the practice is now that if a Senator should send more than $60 worth of telegrams per annum the cost comes out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the Government pays for them. Under the amendment which I have offered, if a Senator should send more than $60 worth per annum, then the Government would pay for them out of the contingent fund of the Senate, if they were on official business; but the contingent fund of the Senate would be credited with the amount over and above the $60 that any Senator is entitled to receive for sending telegrams.

Mr. BRISTOW. The effect of the amendment then is—and I invite the Senator's attention to it again—simply to give Senators a rebate upon what I term "political correspondence" after it has passed the $60 limit; and it gives Senators the Government rate, where otherwise they would have to pay, as they ought to do, full rates for all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator and I are of a different opinion as to the result of the amendment and as to the resolution itself. The resolution specifically provides that it shall be "public business"; and, Mr. President, it would be impossible, it seems to me, to construe a political telegram to be "public business."

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator would find, though, if he were a member of the Committee on Contingent Expenses and considered these accounts, that it is not at all impossible that you could take many telegrams that are sent and apply the term "public business" to them. A primary election is public business, although it may relate to the election of county officers.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but "public business" of that kind is not to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate. The resolution specifically provides that that which is paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate should apply only to public business as affecting the Senate itself and telegrams that may be sent by the Senator or received by him upon such business.

Mr. BRISTOW. The language of the Senator's amendment simply breaks down the limitation which the Senate Committee on Contingent Expenses have undertaken to impose.

Mr. SMOOT. Not as to the amount that the Government is to pay for telegrams.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I should couple that with my former declaration, that, after that limitation is reached, then it gives a Senator a rebate on all telegrams after the sum of $60 a year has been expended.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me take a case and see how unjust the Senator's proposition would be as affecting a Senator from California, for instance, or a Senator from Utah. If a telegram is sent on public business, it does seem to me that a Senator who lives in California should not be charged the rate of a dollar for 10 words, when, as official business, if paid for by the Government, the charge would be only 20 cents. Every telegram sent to the State of Utah from Washington costs 75 cents for 10 words if it be a day message. I do not see any justification for a Senator being compelled to pay, as we who live in the West are compelled to pay, heavy charges for telegrams on official business, which, if sent by the Government on the same business, would involve a much lower charge. As I have said, instead of the rate being 75 cents to the State of Utah it would be 20 cents, and instead of being a dollar to San Francisco and to the State of Washington it would also be 20 cents. I believe that a Senator is entitled to have that rate on messages covering the same kind of business that he is allowed to send at the expense of the Government to the amount of $60 per annum. I do not see a particle of difference between the two cases, nor do I see why the telegraph company or anyone else should object to a Senator sending telegrams in excess of $60 a year at the same rate allowed the Government if they are on the identical kind of official business and sent for the same identical purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, as I said in the beginning, this controversy arose because of differences of opinion as to what was "official business." Heretofore it has been the practice to permit a Senator himself to judge——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRISTOW. In just a moment—to permit a Senator himself to judge as to what he regarded as "official business," and the views of Senators varied so widely as to what was "official business" that there followed a very marked difference in the expenditures of Senators out of the telegraph fund. Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I notice that the resolution as reported by the committee refers to "public business." The Senator from Kansas and other members of the committee keep referring to "official business." Why did the committee use the word "public" instead of the word "official"?

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not know that it had. When the matter was before the committee I supposed the word "official" was used. I should never have voted for the resolution with the word "public" inserted instead of the word "official," because I think it throws the bars down to reckless expenditures.

Mr. BRYAN. It might be well to say "public and official."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that the Western Union Telegraph Co., and I think the Postal Telegraph Co. also, sends a card to each Senator on which the term "official business" is used. I have never sent a telegram of official character—and I have not sent many—on which I did not write the words "official business." I think that is a safer term than "public business."

Mr. BRISTOW. Very much better; and I shall offer an amendment to the resolution to strike out the word "public" and to insert the word "official," because the word "public" in the resolution simply throws the doors wide open to the rankest kind of abuse, because you can say anything is "public business" if it refers to anything in which the public may be interested, while "official business" is the term that has always been applied in such cases.

I want to say that my own judgment was, and is yet, that the better method for the committee to have pursued would have been to have defined what it regarded as "official business"; to have fixed a rule for official business, and to apply that rule to the auditing of its accounts, so that when a Senator sends a telegram not on official business, according to the rules fixed by the committee, they can simply turn down the item and let him deal with the telegraph company himself.

That is the rule which I think should have been followed, but the committee thought otherwise—that it would be better, rather than undertake to audit each individual telegram, to fix a limit beyond which a Senator could not go, and then leave it to the judgment and the honor of Senators as to whether the privilege would be abused, but fixing a limit beyond which the abuse could not go, if any Senator were disposed to abuse it. The committee having come to that conclusion, I acquiesced in its judgment so far as that goes; but when you take the limit off by simply extending a rebate privilege and permit a Senator to construe the term "public business" as he pleases, it opens up a proposition that I can not stand for at all, because I think it would lead to a worse abuse than the one we are trying to get away from.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator probably remembers the difficulties which we had with relation to this matter. The Senator will remember that it took a great deal of time to segregate the telegrams. He will remember that it took two weeks of the time of my stenographer and two weeks of the time of the stenographer of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] even to prepare a collation of the facts as to what each Senator had spent on account of telegrams. If you are going to leave to the committee the question of determining whether a telegram is official or whether it is not official, it will involve an amount of work upon the committee which is entirely too much for any committee to undertake.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield, I realize that, and that was why I acquiesced in the rule which the committee finally determined upon as reported in the resolution, except I supposed we were still clinging to the word "official" instead of the word "public," as I think the committee intended to do. I think the word "public" has crept into the resolution by some error.

If the Senator will further yield, the amendment of the Senator from Utah will not relieve the committee of the auditing in detail, for it permits every Senator to fix in his own mind what is "public business," and when he goes beyond the $60 limit, for the communications beyond that amount he is getting a rebate from the telegraph company, which otherwise he would not get without this amendment. The Senator can see clearly that that will be the effect of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I can see that might be so in the event a Senator should abuse the privilege; but if a Senator uses the privilege for the sending of an official message it is not a rebate from the telegraph company, because the telegraph company have a contract with the Government by which they send on official business messages at low rates; and, consequently, if you do not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah it will simply deprive Senators who may live far from Washington, or who send frequent telegrams, of the privilege of sending messages on official business in excess of $60 a year at the lower rate accorded the Government, and I do not think that would be right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say in relation to the matter of auditing——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment. This whole controversy came up and this resolution is here because of what the committee regarded as an abuse of the privilege. By adopting the amendment of the Senator from Utah we are not taking away the opportunity for the abuse of the privilege; we are simply extending it, leaving the opportunities for abuse which we are undertaking to correct exactly as they are; so that, instead of a Senator, as has been the case in the past, having to pay back into the Treasury or having to settle with the telegraph company from the standpoint of a private citizen for the telegrams which are not regarded as official, we permit him to settle not at the rate which the private citizen must pay, but at the Government rate; that is, we are giving him a rebate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It can readily be seen that that is nothing but fair if the message is sent on official business, and that is presumed to be the case. This limit is fixed so that there will not have to be an inquiry in regard to it; it becomes too small a matter to inquire into; and on that account it seems to me that it is perfectly proper that the amendment of the Senator from Utah shall prevail.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas in relation to the auditing, that there will be no more auditing for the committee to do under the amendment offered by me than there would be under the original resolution, except as to those Senators who may have sent telegrams in excess of $60 per annum; and there will be very few of them, indeed, so that the auditing will not amount to much. One clerk of one Senator could do it in a day for a full year.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator may think so; but if he had to do the auditing, he would change his mind. I think the Senator from Colorado will at least confirm that statement. It is not so easy to audit hundreds and thousands of telegrams as the Senator seems to think.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee would not have to audit any telegrams of any Senator unless he had exceeded the $60 yearly allowance, so far as the resolution is concerned, and so far as the amendment itself is concerned.

Mr. BRISTOW. So far as I am concerned, I think that the amendment exaggerates the abuse we have had; and the committee had better never have reported any resolution at all than to permit it to be amended as it is proposed to amend it now. I shall resist the adoption of the amendment; and, if it is adopted, I shall resist the adoption of the resolution with every effort that I can exert, because I think it is wrong fundamentally.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, there is an old adage as to "saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung." I think if there was ever a demonstration of that proverb it is in this controversy. According to Senators who have pressed this resolution, the saving involved would be something like $3,000 a year, and I am informed on credible authority that it costs to maintain the Senate from $6,000 to $7,000 a day, or a thousand dollars an hour while it is in session. So we are wasting the public funds instead of saving them.

I feel that the public will sustain the Senate in leaving it to the honor and judgment of Senators as to the method of sending telegrams, and I move to amend Senate resolution 156 by striking out all after the word "Resolved."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to rule that that amendment is not now in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am constrained to say that I think this is among the most unfortunate debates that have ever taken place in the Senate of the United States. At best it is an inconsequential matter. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] says we are going to save possibly $3,000 a year, and we are losing more money than that by keeping up this interminable debate on this resolution. Crowded galleries have listened to the oratory on this resolution for hours on two or three different occasions, and I am interested to know just what kind of an impression will be created when people from different sections of the country who have been here return to their homes and report that when they were in Washington they listened to the Senators of the United States discussing a question whether they could be trusted to send telegrams at public expense.

The other day I offered an amendment providing that no telegram should be sent by any Senator at public expense. I did so for the simple reason that I had become tired of this controversy. I withdrew that amendment at the suggestion of other Senators, but the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has, in a little different form, offered it again. I shall vote for that proposed substitute.

I do not want to do an injustice to any Senator, whether he lives near Washington or at a distance from Washington. There is an inequality in the matter as it stands to-day, and there will be an inequality under whatever conclusion we reach, just as there is an inequality in the matter of mileage as between Senators who live at a distance from Washington and those who live near Washington. In that case it works to the disadvantage of those of us who live near Washington, while in this case it would work to the disadvantage of those who live a long distance from Washington.

Mr. President, I do sincerely hope that this discussion will soon terminate and that we will take a vote on the matter before the Senate. I can not believe that if the rule is left as it is—and I happened to be chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate when that arrangement with the Western Union and, I believe, with the other telegraph company was made through the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and approved by the committee—if it is left as it is, I can not conceive that there will be many abuses under it.

I send very few telegrams. Perhaps if I lived in the far West I should send more, but I send very few. When this matter is put at $60 a year as the maximum, however, it is a direct invitation to me to use the telegraph to a larger extent than I am using it to-day. I hope I would resist that temptation, but it would be a temptation.

There have been very few abuses so far as I can learn, and there will be very few abuses in the future if the matter is left precisely as it is, and if this question, which has agitated the minds of Members of the Senate for so many hours, is finally disposed of in that way. If it is not to be left in that way, however, I shall then vote for the substitute of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], doing away with this privilege altogether.

I do not think the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is a wise amendment. What does it do? It gives Senators a certain stipulated amount that they may spend for telegrams, and then it says, "You can do just as much business as you please beyond that at Government rates." We all know what that would mean.

If the word "public" is to be left in the resolution, it will cover a multitude of sins, and we ought not to be permitted that privilege. Let it be "official business" or "Government business" or have some term used that will define it so that we can not be sending telegrams on every conceivable subject that is agitating the public mind.

Mr. President, the initiative and the referendum and recall are burning questions. If I chose, under the liberal interpretation that is sometimes given, I might, by use of the telegraph, ask a hundred or a thousand of my constituents what they thought about those questions, and whether or not I ought to vote for them.

There is one other point. A great many telegrams are sent when a 2-cent postage stamp will answer the same purpose. Looking back to the time when a great many people were permitted the free use of the telegraph lines, I know that I received telegrams by the tens and perhaps by the hundreds, where the information might just as well have been communicated to me by means of a letter; but these people had the privilege of using the telegraph, and they used it on every conceivable occasion.

I rose simply to say that it seems to me this matter has been thoroughly discussed; we all understand the exact status of the case; and we ought by a vote to dispose of it, and take up some other more important business on the calendar.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from New Hampshire. I think this is a trivial matter; and although it is trivial I think it is a humiliating and an unfortunate thing to have brought before the United States Senate.

I send very few telegrams. I think probably $5 a month, which this resolution authorizes—$60 a year—would a good deal more than cover what I send. I can get along without the privilege. I never have used it, so far as I know, except to answer inquiries from my constituents about the public business of the Senate and matters connected therewith, but that is perfectly irrelevant.

I think it is perfectly clear that it is either proper for the Government to pay for the expense to which Senators are put in the discharge of their official duties, or else it is not proper for the Government to do it. If it is thought wise to compel Senators to pay the necessary expense of telegrams to their constituents, very well; but whatever is done, I do not need and I do not want a bell punch put upon me. I do not want, every time I send a telegram, to have to think, "I wonder if I have exceeded my $5 limit or allowance." I, for one, decline to submit to any such humiliating restriction, and I decline to avail myself of any such degrading privilege.

If I have to vote on this miserable thing at all—and I have tried to avoid it by voting to table it or to get it back into the committee, and get it out of the public gaze—if I have to vote on it at all I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] or of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], whichever one it is that cuts out the privilege altogether or else leaves it to the honor of the Senators themselves to decide what they think is the proper limit for themselves, which has always heretofore been done, and which I believe has been exceeded only in the rarest instances. It is perfectly trivial and disgusting as a matter of public debate.

I will say in passing, inasmuch as this has been compared with the stationery account, that I do not know by virtue of what the stationery account exists, whether it is by a resolution of the Senate or by a statute; but whatever it is, if anybody will get up a resolution, or whatever paper is necessary to cut that out also, I shall vote to cut it out. I do not want the money, and I do not believe any Senator needs it. These are mere petty, little things that are not worthy to be dragged on the floor of the Senate here and discussed.

A lot of poor people—not poor in wealth but poor in intellect—delight to think that Senators of the United States are snooping around after little, petty morsels of toasted cheese in the shape of little grafts here and there; and some people think it is a great reform, and that they can make some political or other kind of capital, moral or otherwise, by making great demonstrations, introducing resolutions, and having hearings on bills to abolish them. It is too contemptible, in my opinion, to indulge in, and I hate to be connected with the subject in any way.

If we can not get this thing back into the committee, or lay it on the table, why, let us vote to abolish the whole thing and get done with it. I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa or any other that will abolish it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I may have to be absent when the vote is taken on this matter. I desire to say before going that if I shall be present when it is taken I propose to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], for the reason that it is the only logical conclusion at which we may arrive after what has been established by reason of this discussion.

There can be no reason in the world for the introduction of this resolution, it seems to me, other than that the individual Members of the Senate are supposed to be incapable of judiciously using this privilege. It is a deplorable imputation, but it seems that we have arrived at that condition of affairs.

There is no more reason for trusting me with a few dollars over $60 than with trusting me with a few dollars under $60, or vice versa. If it should transpire that my telegrams amounted to only $30 a year, I would be trusted with the enormous responsibility of spending the difference between $30 and $60—a trust which no longer ought to be reposed in a Senator of the United States. [Laughter.]

If it is public business, Mr. President, if I telegraph to my constituency upon matters of public concern, they are infinitely more interested in getting such telegrams than they are in the millions of dollars which we appropriate here year after year for other business.

Mr. President, I say this in all respect for the Senators who have favored this resolution, because I know the Senator who is urging it; I know his integrity, his personal standing, and his sense of personal honor, and I do not reflect upon that for a moment. I do say, however, that there is no logic in this situation other than absolutely to take away from the Senate of the United States the discretion of using any public money or public right at all, and I shall vote, therefore, to cut out the privilege entirely.

Mr. President, I am going to vote to abolish this privilege entirely. There is no other position, as I see the matter, which we can take and be logical with regard to it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Would the Senator from Idaho have this board of censors pass upon the propriety of public buildings and similar matters?

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not do that, because that is of some importance.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply wish to inquire why that principle does not apply to a Senator?

Mr. BORAH. I should not want to enter upon that discussion here, but it seems it does not. That is the object of this resolution—to take away temptation—is it not?

Mr. THOMAS. That may be; but one inference that I gathered was that you could not tempt the virtue of a Senator because he had not any. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator is absolutely logical, because I believe when you resolve this matter into its final analysis it comes down to the fact that you can not trust us. I think the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Colorado will agree to that proposition—that it is because you can not trust us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know whether I will agree to that proposition or not, but I am sure that all the political record of the Senator from Idaho enforces the proposition. He is a very prominent member of a party which has been built up upon distrust of the representatives of the people and upon the general principle that they can not be trusted at all; that they must be initiated and referendumed and recalled and primaried and instructed here and there, and that a government founded upon any trust in the representatives of the people is a government founded upon sand.

I am willing to trust them wherever they have no interest of a personal character, and I am willing to trust them even there to a certain extent; but I remember that Thomas Jefferson once said something about public officials not being gods and not being saints. I do not find that they are much better or much worse than other people. I find them a little bit better informed, because it is their business to be better informed.

I have appreciated very much the remarks just made by the Senator from Idaho. They have been, I think, of a delicately ironical character, highly to be appreciated; and I hope that if he really means them to be ironical and not to be in earnest, he will reconstruct some of his own views about the necessity of always maintaining a tight bridle rein upon the representatives of the people. I go some distance with him in that direction. I think there ought to be a bridle upon them, at any rate, but I do not know that it ought to be a snap bit. I think the ordinary bit will do. Still I think, as a rule, Senators are no better than anybody else, and the less room you give anybody to abuse anything the better.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that. That is the reason I am endeavoring to cut out this privilege entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the less special privilege you extend to anybody the better. We have not been seeking to reform the entire world by this resolution. Of course the Senator from Colorado and I think it is an awfully important thing——

Mr. BORAH. I can see that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And we think it is going to start the great work of uplifting and reforming along the right line; but we really have expected no millennium as the result of it, and we do not expect to change human nature very particularly, either official or unofficial.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi and I agree—I think we agree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think so. [Laughter.] That is to say, we trust officials——

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But we do not trust them too blamed much.

Mr. BORAH. Well, we trust ourselves, but we do not trust the other fellow. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho to yield to me, since he referred to me in the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFIECR. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield, although I referred to the Senator in a way to which he can not take any exception.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; except that the Senator thought it was a matter purely of distrust that caused the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to bring in this resoluion. I wish to say that there is an element of average which does not involve the question of distrust at all, because Senators have a perfect right to construe matters of this kind. I was one of the Senators on the committee who held that every telegram that was presented by the Senators could, according to the construction of the Senator himself, be allowed as official business. Consequently it was not on the theory of distrust that I acted. I acted upon the theory that there was too much money being expended for this purpose in a manner which was not to the economy of the Nation, and consequently it ought to be curbed to some extent.

If this is such a trivial matter, why is it that you do not let us take a vote? Why is it that we do not get a disposition of this matter? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and I have been trying here for three successive days to get a vote on this matter, and it seems to me we are entitled to it.

If the Senator will allow me, I ask unanimous consent that the word "public" be stricken out of the resolution and that the word "official" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest the words "strictly official."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the modification suggested by the Senator from Colorado will be made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to observe that if this resolution has taken only three days of the time of the Senate up to this moment, it has made pretty good progress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The resolution did not take that long. It required two days to try to get it up, without being able to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. No measure ever takes that long. It is getting to it that consumes our time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Question!

Mr. BORAH. In view of what the Senator from Colorado has said, I will yield the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have sat in the Chamber for some three or four hours to-day hoping that we might dispose of this question, but the talk seems interminable, and now that we seem to be on the point of reaching a vote I am moved to say a word or two myself.

During my service in the Senate I have seen a good deal of time wasted in perfectly idle talk, but in about nine years of service here I do not remember to have seen so much time consumed over a matter so utterly trivial as that with which we are dealing. I think this whole debate is exceedingly unfortunate, because it goes to the country and gives the people of the country an entirely false impression of the situation here in the Senate.

I venture to say that this resolution has been brought in and this whole debate has resulted probably from the abuse of this privilege—and perhaps I had better qualify that by saying the unintentional abuse of this privilege—by not more than half a dozen Members of the Senate. Out of the 96 Members of the Senate I venture to say—and I may be corrected by the chairman of the committee if I am in error about it—that 90 Members of the Senate keep within the $60 limitation that is sought to be imposed by this resolution. During my service here I do not believe I have expended upon telegrams upon official business to exceed $60 during the whole nine years. I should be very much surprised to find that I have expended more than that amount.

I think the individual Senator can be trusted to do the decent and proper thing with reference to a privilege of this character. I do not like the idea of putting a limitation upon the expenditure, because it carries with it the implication that the limitation is necessary. I do not believe it is. If you put the limitation upon this expenditure, I do not believe you will save to the Government a single cent.

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor either of leaving this matter as it is and voting down this resolution entirely, or of adopting the substitute which has been presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. Rather than put any limitation upon it, rather than admit that my own and the sense of honor of my colleagues is so small that the proper exercise of it must be limited by a resolution of the Senate, I would take away the privilege altogether.

So I shall vote for the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa; and if that does not carry, I shall vote against the entire resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs upon the amendment offered by way of a substitute by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] proposes to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That hereafter no telegrams shall be sent by Senators at the expense of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "yea."

Mr. KERN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], I transfer it to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). May I inquire if the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). He has not.

Mr. THOMAS. I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). As heretofore announced, my colleague [Mr. MYERS] is absent from the Chamber to-day on account of illness. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to my colleague and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the affirmative). I am advised that my colleague [Mr. MYERS], to whom I transferred my pair, is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I accordingly transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] are absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. If the junior Senator from Minnesota were present, I am authorized to state that he would vote "yea" on this proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I voted "nay" because I thought I was compelled to abide by the action of the committee. Some of the committee not having taken that view of it, I desire to change my vote, and vote "yea" instead of "nay," thus expressing my own opinion.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a pair, is absent from the Chamber. He has not voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (after having voted in the negative). Inasmuch as a number of the committee have deemed it wise to vote contrary to the action of the committee, I wish to withdraw my vote and to vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 6, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1914.

The House met at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God our heavenly Father, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for all the unfolding and uplifting forces which make for righteousness in the hearts of men. Give us, we beseech Thee, plenteously of the light that illumines the mind, the strength that quickens the soul and fails not, the love that warms the heart and never dies, that we may go forward to the duties of the hour rejoicing in the opportunity to serve Thee by a conscientious service to our fellow men. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order.

ORDER IN THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state at the beginning of the day's labor that the debate is liable to be exceedingly interesting, if not at times acrimonious, although the Chair hopes that it will not be acrimonious. Therefore, the Chair requests that gentlemen refrain from conversation all day long. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. In view of the point of no quorum just made, I want to say that it is liable to be all day long and all night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has withdrawn the point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I congratulate the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also wishes to say to the occupants of the galleries that they are here by the courtesy of the House, that they must not talk enough to obstruct business on the floor, and that they must not applaud. If they do the galleries are liable to be cleared.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the Sims bill, as unfinished business.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from California wish to go on now?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I understand that the gentleman from Oregon wishes to occupy some of his time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. I. NOLAN].

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, as a Member of this body I have given considerable time and study to President Wilson's brief message of March 5, 1914, asking the House of Representatives to repeal that section of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls.

I approached this subject with an open mind, notwithstanding the fact that the city of San Francisco, which I in part represent in this House, is greatly interested from a manufacturing and commercial standpoint on the tolls question.

After careful consideration of this matter I have concluded that I can not grant the request of the President to vote for the repeal of this clause and at the same time maintain my self-respect as a representative of the American people.

The President in his message states, first of all, that after mature consideration he considers the exemption of coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls "a mistaken economic policy"; and in support of this statement does not give any facts or reasons to show how he arrived at this conclusion. And so far during the debate on this floor no man in favor of repeal has advanced a single argument for this view, which could only be determined by several years' experience in the operation of the canal under the present exemption law. We on the Pacific coast are satisfied that the opposite is true when we figure that $1.20 per ton might be charged against such cargo as coal or coke going to the Pacific and lumber and the products of lumber coming to the Atlantic, as well as great cargoes of fruit and wines which will be shipped through the canal. And if the coastwise shipping should be in the hands of a monopoly, the farmers of California will either build or charter their own ships and outfit them for the carrying trade, and the toll rate of $1.20 a ton on a 6,000-ton ship would be equivalent almost to the operating expenses of that vessel. So that, after all, from an economic standpoint tolls exemption means much to the producer and also to the consumer, and would not, as some of the proponents of repeal have tried to lead us to believe, find its way into the pockets of the Shipping Trust.

The President also states in his message that the Panama Canal act of August, 1912, is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concluded November 18, 1901, and he makes only a plain assertion to this effect, without going into the question at all and giving Congress logical reasons for this sudden change of front from platform and preelection pledges.

The people who have been led to trust men like President Wilson and Secretary Bryan will not take kindly to the utter disregard of their party platform by men who were supposed to represent the highest ideals in American public life and who are not giving any valid reason in this instance for violation of their pledges after their positive declarations denouncing public officials in the past who have been recreant to their trust.

Is it possible that the Democratic leaders in this instance are sacrificing principle to expediency, or is it a plain case of losing their nerve? The people will surely demand an accounting. The position taken by the President in reference to the violation of our treaty with Great Britain has not been sustained on this floor in the debate on the Sims bill by its sponsors. On the contrary, the advocates of repeal have failed in every instance to make good their contention that we are violating the treaty of November 18, 1901, and that this Nation has not the right to specify the conditions under which the canal shall be operated, especially in regard to our domestic commerce.

Does President Wilson think that the people of the United States, who have furnished the $400,000,000 to build the canal, are going to be satisfied with bald statements that are not backed up with facts? They are not, and they will not accept this situation with the same easy frame of mind that the President has found among a large number of Members of this House, who are equally obligated with him to observe the tolls exemption plank of the Baltimore platform.

What are the "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" to which the President refers in his message to this House? Does anyone know? Has anyone heard what they are? No advocate of repeal has thrown any light on this subject. They seem to avoid discussing the final paragraph of the President's message. Why is it possible that the President can not take into his confidence the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, which is composed of Democrats, Republicans, and Progressives? If he is confronted with matters of grave concern to our Government in the conduct of our foreign affairs, it is his duty as President to inform the House at this time, through the committee, which could be done without publicity if secrecy is necessary. My understanding of the matter is that the reverse is true. Secretary Bryan informed the committee, according to a leading American newspaper, that, as far as he knew, there was no crisis in our foreign affairs at this time along the line suggested in the President's message. This statement was made voluntarily after he had appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee recently in connection with the Mexican situation; and the statement, it is generally understood, was made at a meeting of the committee to the same effect.

A great number of the men who were Members of the United States Senate at the time the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties were submitted have been quoted in the RECORD as to their recollection as to the right of the United States to exempt our coastwise shipping, and what their view was as to the necessity of making specific mention of this exemption in the treaty. In this connection I wish to submit a letter which I have received from the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, former Senator Albert J. Beveridge, which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1914.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. NOLAN: Answering your letter of inquiry just received. I was in the Senate when both of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties were considered. My recollection is as follows:

When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion several Senators gave as reasons for voting against Senator Bard's amendment that it was unnecessary because under the treaty, even as it then stood, we had a perfect right to exempt our coastwise shipping from payment of tolls.

I voted for Senator Bard's amendment, not because I had any doubt upon the subject, but because the fullest possible American rights over the canal could not be stated too strongly for me.

When the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty came up for consideration, so unanimous was the opinion of Senators that under the treaty our right over tolls was undoubted that Senator Bard did not even propose or offer his amendment again. Instead, he himself voted for the resolution advising the ratification of the treaty without amendment, which carried almost unanimously. This second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the one now under consideration.

From my recollection of the matter, I think it certain that the Senate would not have advised ratification if it had been seriously contended that the treaty denied us the right to favor our own coastwise vessels.

Trusting that I have answered your question fully, I am,

Very sincerely,

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

[Applause.]

If the President is right in this instance, and the Members of the United States Senate who ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are wrong as to their interpretation of it, let us look at the situation we are now confronted with in relation to Nicaragua. As I understand it, there are negotiations now being carried on between the representatives of our Government and the Government of Nicaragua looking to the acquirement, through treaty, by the United States of the right to do at Nicaragua what we have done at Panama, and that is, if deemed advisable by the United States, to build and to control a canal over the Nicaragua route. If this repeal bill passes, it had best be followed up by the declaring off of all negotiations with the Government of Nicaragua for canal rights, as the people of this country will not stand for paying the cost of another canal without the right to regulate the conditions of its operation. [Applause.]

Neither do I believe the United States Senate will ratify another canal treaty, even under the lash of the President of the United States. If the Nicaragua Canal be built, let George build it, the "George" in this instance being King George the Fifth. Let him build the canal, and then see how magnanimous Great Britain will be with this country and the other nations of the world, and how quick she will resent what she could rightly term "interference in her domestic affairs," if our country should protest in the same way that Great Britain is protesting now.

The President further states that this question is not debated outside the United States, and is debatable only among our own people. Recently the lobby committee of the United States Senate decided to investigate the lobby interested in free tolls, and they examined one man who was supposed to favor free tolls in the interest of the shipbuilders, a statement which has since been denied under oath by the president of one of the shipbuilding companies, Admiral Bowles, who testified before the committee. They also called to the stand the secretary of the Carnegie Peace Foundation, who admitted that the orgarization had spent over $30,000 in a propaganda campaign for the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause, and further stated that 750,000 copies of Senator ROOT's speech had been sent out in this campaign, as well as 1,000,000 circular letters to individuals and organizations. The books of this organization have not as yet been investigated to find out if money has been spent in any other way to influence public sentiment. Is there any reason why this question of tolls exemption should not be a debatable one in this country and why it should not be settled in other countries, which, however, is not the fact, when you consider that the millions of Andrew Carnegie have been at the disposal of a number of influential pro-British Americans who masquerade behind the peace movement but who would sacrifice American institutions to curry favor with royalty?

Is it possible that the President of the United States has fallen a victim to the machinations of this designing group, led by the man and financed by the money of this same individual who was morally responsible for the slaughter of scores of men during the Homestead strike, who were shot down by armed thugs acting under the orders of Andrew Carnegie and his hirelings, and whose only offense was to ask for a small share of what they thought was justly theirs, and which this man is now seeking to dispose of in various ways, and a large part of which is used in undermining our American institutions? This is the man and this is the money that is being used to further the repeal of free tolls for coastwise shipping, and all for one purpose, and that is to humiliate the United States in the eyes of the whole world and to further the interests of Great Britain. Some of these men, like Carnegie, are British born and little else is to be expected of them. Like Benedict Arnold, they are willing to surrender our American traditions to the British lion. I trust that the President of the United States has not fallen a victim to this movement, but in seeking to influence public men they use many cunning and canny methods. I trust that when the smoke of battle clears away we will find the President of the United States free from the toils of this group.

In coming to Congress I made a pledge to my people to support every progressive measure in a nonpartisan spirit and to work in the interest of constructive legislation, and I have conscientiously tried to carry out this pledge. I have been supporting the administration whenever in my judgment it was right. In this connection I refer to my vote on the tariff bill, when I voted in favor of the measure. As a Representative from California, the popular thing for me to have done would have been to vote against the tariff bill, on account of my State being a particular beneficiary from the high protective tariff. I voted as my conscience dictated and as I believe was right when we consider the interests of all the people as against the interests of any particular section of our country, and the same motive will actuate me in voting against the repeal, as I would not be in favor of retaining our right to grant free tolls if the economic phase was the only principle involved. The great principle at stake in this matter is whether we are going to unconditionally surrender our rights at the request of Great Britain, and I cast my vote against repeal with strong feelings of patriotism, as I consider the national honor of my country hangs in the balance, and that is the only crisis at hand at this time.

It is about time this country stopped trifling in the handling of our foreign affairs and stopped truckling to England and Japan, and especially the latter, to whom we have been conceding much since 1907, by each successive administration; and this applies particularly to the internal affairs of the State of California, who, whenever its citizens have tried to protect themselves from the Asiatic peril, have been coerced by the National Government at the instance of Japan, and particularly because her subjects have large financial and commercial interests in the State of California. Japan has not complained when other States in our Union have adopted drastic anti-Asiatic measures, and this has happened in Arizona and one of our near-by Southern States recently. Japan did not protest, for the reason that the interests of her subjects were not materially affected; and when the financial and commercial interests of the Japanese in this country are not affected the Japanese have not any national honor involved. I cite this to show that we have been interfering with the internal rights of the States when we had no right to do so, and should have, as in the instance of Japan, notified them that California had a perfect right to settle her own affairs. This policy has encouraged Great Britain and Japan, who are allies, to persist in trying to humiliate our Nation in the eyes of the world and to demonstrate that the United States is not a stickler in the matter of the Nation's honor.

When the people of the West have applied to Congress for relief in the matter of extending the exclusion law to all Asiatics and Hindus they have had to whisper into a deaf ear. I call attention to the Hayes amendment offered to the Burnett immigration bill when that bill was pending in the House. This amendment was rejected, and at that time the proponents of Asiatic exclusion were promised by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration prompt action and a hearing on these bills. Up to date we have not been able to get any consideration of these measures. When we appeared at the time set for the hearing we found the committee behind closed doors in executive session, and this owing to the activity of the administration, under the leadership of Secretary of State Bryan, who appeared personally before the committee and succeeded in having consideration of all Asiatic exclusion bills stopped. Is this another interference with the legislative branch of the Government by the Executive on the ground that "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" were involved, or is it another instance of sacrificing our national honor and the rights of the American people in order that the dove of peace may still hover over us at no matter how great a sacrifice of principle? And once again Japan emerges smilingly, by means of a timely protest and a good publicity bureau.

The time has arrived to settle this repeal question once and for all and to serve notice on Carnegie and Carnegieism that their pro-British campaign must cease or they must seek other lands. If the President's desire is granted by Congress, the question is not settled and will not rest. The people of the United States will register their protest in no uncertain terms in November, 1914, and again in November, 1916, against this unwarranted surrender of American rights in the Panama Canal, which were acquired by American ingenuity, which work was conceived by American genius and built by American money. The people who approved the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, by their votes in November, 1912, will not treat lightly the violation of a sacred platform pledge by the Democratic President, even though he be fortified in his position by the former champion of party platforms, Mr. Bryan. The voters of this country will demand an explanation, and that before very long; and woe betide the present administration if the President does not advance any further reasons for this unconditional surrender to Great Britain than he or his forces have already advanced before the American Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I will use five minutes of my time now.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic ship of state, with Mr. Bryan as aviator, has now been up in the air for more than a year. [Laughter.]

Soon after the Democrats came into power the premier of the Wilson administration took his place in the party biplane and aviated to California. It was a new machine, just from the factory. It was supplied with all the necessaries for a four-year cruise in the diplomatic heavens, including a large quantity of grape juice. [Laughter.]

On the west coast the ship encountered dangerous cross currents of racial prejudice. The baffling breezes of protest and indignation buffeted the ship about for several weeks, and the aviator's feet became cold. [Laughter and applause.] He decided to return to the East, where he gave many exhibitions of looping the loop before large Chautauqua audiences. Thereby the aviator augmented the meager and insufficient salary which Uncle Sam was paying him.

After sailing around the Chautauqua circuit in triumph, the aviator struck out boldly for a long-distance flight to the south, intending to make a landing on the Rio Grande, where he could "watch and wait." [Laughter.] But near the Mexican border he was suddenly precipitated into air pockets of treachery which damaged his planes. His cylinders began to miss fire. His carburetor got out of adjustment. He was unable to land on the Rio Grande.

In desperation the airman of the administration was seized with the idea that he could regain his reputation as an international aviator by doing "the large thing," sailing farther to the south, and giving to the other nations of the world a free exhibition by landing on the Panama Canal. His fuel was almost exhausted. He attempted to fire his engines with a mysterious fuel not known to the rest of the country. But his carburetor immediately became choked up with "matters of greater delicacy and nearer consequence." [Laughter.] A rain of protest short-circuited his ignition wires and burnt out his batteries. The engine stopped. The aviator is now volplaning toward the rocks.

Our airship of state will be brought back safely to earth and started out right when the Sims bill is defeated.

Let us hope that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will again take the floor in support of his bill just before the roll call, and that he will propose to the faithful followers of the administration on this bill the following "free-tolls yell," a la Princeton:

The President has taken snuff,
For all true patriots that's enough;
We sneeze in concert, one, two, three,
Kerchew! Kerchew! Kerchew! Kerchee!

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, administrations come and go. Principles live. It will not be whether we stood by the President, but whether we stood for our country. We are about to surrender a great principle "right or wrong, because everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation." The President made this statement to us, notwithstanding the fact that the first note from Great Britain on July 8, 1912, on the Panama Canal measure said that—

If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no exception could be taken.

Other authorities in Europe concede this. Secretary Olney, of Mr. Cleveland's administration, Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Taft, and Secretary Knox are in accord as to the right to exempt coastwise ships.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that in that great enterprise, the Panama Canal, costing nearly $400,000,000, constructed by our genius, paid for in its entirety by the American people, owned absolutely by us, that we have the right under the treaty to exempt all our ships, and when this question is thoroughly debated and thought out by the people that will be the result. The representatives of Great Britain are too astute, too well trained in the subtleties of diplomacy to doubt in their hearts the soundness of the present law.

It is a pretext that is now advanced, bolstered up by false information, deliberately, systematically spread in this country and abroad, selfish European interests aided and abetted by selfish un-American interests in this country, with the hope that the cry of international dishonor and covert threats of reprisal would appeal to our peace-loving tendencies and generous qualities. No other country in the world during the past century has done so much as the United States to promote the cause of justice, good will, and progress among nations; yet because of the unfair, prejudicial views, mercenarily cultivated, we are asked to surrender the great, vital right of regulating our own commerce in order to appease that prejudice. Oh, that the spirit of a Pinckney might hover over the White House. Millions for defense, but no sacrifice of a right or a concession in trade for tribute.

Mr. Speaker, I do not rejoice in the divided sentiment on the majority side of the House. To me this great question makes no partisan appeal. I would vastly prefer to see unanimity among the Democrats based on sound American patriotism and this question settled for all time in the interest of the general welfare of our country. And you, Mr. Speaker, esteemed by all for your splendid character, and you Mr. UNDERWOOD, able leader of your party, and your associates in this contest, who did so much to make possible a Democratic victory and place in the White House a Democratic President, you are the real, sincere friends of your party and the true friends of our misguided President, able, honest, and patriotic, as I believe him to be. Not to-day in this House perhaps, but to-morrow certainly, your reward will be the gratitude of your party and the appreciation of a patriotic people, thoughtful of the words of the immortal Washington, who said:

> Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence—I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens—the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

What great compelling reason prompts a change in our position and that of the President? What threatening foreign dangers invite it, Mr. Speaker? If there should be such, why did not the President confer with the Speaker of this House, the leader of the majority, Mr. UNDERWOOD, or Mr. MANN, of the Republicans, and Mr. MURDOCK, of the Progressives, any or all of them, and indicate to them the reasons why we should repeal the law passed less than two years ago and make this concession to Great Britain? These are patriotic men, thoroughly conscientious, and keenly alive to their responsibilities, to whom valid reasons for surrender would not be in vain.

The London Times states the issue plainly in the following editorial:

> If this bill exempting coastwise ships becomes a law, it will prove a little short of disastrous to British shipowners. With their best brains and energy devoted to their work, the United States will now proceed to turn out vessels on a wholesale scale, and, aided by their freedom from Panama Canal tolls, there is little to prevent them from entering with success all those trades in which British shipowners are now the principal carriers.

That is why Great Britain is opposed to free tolls and is so enthusiastically applauding President Wilson and his associates in their efforts to favor the repeal of that provision. Our annals abound in instances in the past of Great Britain's efforts, many times with success, to cripple and impede our industrial and commercial development, and on this occasion history repeats itself.

Are we going to repeal a measure that, as the London Times says, will inure to the great advantage of our country, uphold American rights and privileges in the control and regulation of our domestic commerce, or bow in deference to foreign wishes for foreign advantage and against American progress?

We have expended about $700,000,000 in river and harbor improvements for free and unrestricted trade between the States, and it was our purpose to extend this privilege to American ships passing through the Panama Canal doing a coastwise trade between the States on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

That is a recognized American principle unquestioned in the past and not now honestly disputed by British authorities in touch with this controversy, as was practically admitted in the first note of British protest.

The measure as it stands is now the law of the country, indorsed by our people with practical unanimity. Our country may need the awakening that this issue given us by the President will arouse. We perhaps need to make an accounting of our rights and the quality of our patriotism. All England stands back of its contention, unreasonable as it is. To-day in this House we show a divided front, but throughout the Nation the feelings of American love and loyalty and patriotism are being stirred.

Indeed, the President has given the country a new issue, electrical in its influence and most portentious in its probabilities, but the American people will settle it and settle it in a way to guarantee absolute control to the people who built it and paid for it and own it, and thus prevent the surrender of any interest in or authority over the great Panama Canal.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, we have heard many reasons given by gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House as to why they should repudiate the platform upon which they were elected and follow the President. One of the most interesting and perhaps one of the most illuminating was given by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the author of the bill. He said they should repudiate that plank in the platform because it is an illegitimate child, born of sin and intrigue. From the same high authority it appears certain that that unfortunate child was sired by Bryan and dammed by every railroad in North America. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the question directly involved in the passage of this bill is this: Shall Congress cowardly repudiate its former action, forget the honor of its country, swallow its self-respect, and surrrender to England and the transcontinental railroads to save the "face" of those responsibile for our egotistical, blundering, and discredited foreign policy? Apparently in his serene superiority it has never occurred to the President to reverse his own position instead of asking Congress to change its attitude.

I have no word of censure for any individual Democrat of this House who may follow the dictation of the President. It is no easy position to be placed where you must break with the President or repudiate your party platform. However, this phase of the subject seems to have received but little consideration from the President. But as a majority party charged with the responsibility of upholding the traditions and the self-respect of this legislative body, this policy of cowardly surrender to the dictates of an Executive is deserving of more contempt than the English language can express. What has brought upon us the condition we now face? The egotistical blundering, the "holier-than-thou policy" that we have pursued toward Mexico. We have taken the position that we alone are the only Nation of earth that has the high moral sense to deal justly with the Mexican people. We have been entertained with learned essays and eloquent lectures on constitutional government, and honest and fair elections, and the right of the majority to rule in that distracted country. We all like to hear these things, although we all know that they are ridiculously absurd. Ordinarily such things would be passed by as a plain political attempt to please the public ear. But in troublesome times like these "watchful waiting" under such pretenses has been followed by results so momentous and by deeds so monstrous that they have shocked the civilized world. The other nations are wondering at our weakness and taking advantage of our indecision. In familiar phrase, "Our position is everywhere questioned and misunderstood." And now, as the only way out, the President pleads with us to give him the Panama Canal that he may trade it to purchase influence to prevent some unmentioned but fervently predicted disaster.

From the very beginning the foreign policy of this administration has been weak, vacillating, selfish, and secret. Always there has been an attempt for popular applause and an effort to create the impression of learned superiority and of pious disregard of precedents. A policy in China declared to be based on principle was for commercial gain forgotten in Mexico. A policy in Mexico on high moral and altruistic ground is repudiated in Peru. The morals and the principles and the precedents of our foreign policy are as elastic and as varied as the size and power and influence of the different countries with which we deal. The advertising methods of the Chautauqua circuit are everywhere stamped upon our foreign policy.

When this administration came into power it had a free hand in the Mexican situation. Huerta had just assumed power. The former administration wisely and properly left the questions entirely open. The administration saw fit to ignore the opinion and the suggestions of our ambassador at Mexico, a man of long experience and highest integrity. It saw fit to set aside all precedents and refuse to consult with Members of Congress in regard to the most vexing and important question before the new administration. It ignored the suggestions and advice of the members of the Committees on Foreign Affairs of both the House and the Senate. Although the Senate committee contained such distinguished names as that of Senator Bacon, a man of long experience; Senator LODGE, whose knowledge of foreign affairs is not surpassed by any man; Senator ROOT, a man of great ability, who had served with eminent distinction as Secretary of State; and many other Senators of high standing. In the House was our distinguished chairman of the committee and many other men of experience and ability. But the advice of none of these was sought. Those who had long been in the Department of State and supposed to be learned in diplomatic affairs were given to know that their advice or suggestions were not needed. All those who should have been consulted were conspicuously ignored. Neither their council nor their information was desired. This was the beginning of our misfortunes.

Official source of information and assistance was refused and personal representatives employed for this purpose. A certain Dr. Hale, an ex-preacher who quit the pulpit to become a professional muckraker, an expert on scandal, according to common report, became the personal representative of the President. He was not accredited to the country nor a credit to the country. It was largely through this yellow medium that the President looked upon affairs in Mexico. It was upon such foundation as this that our Mexican policy was formed. Nothing but disaster could follow.

That the President and the Secretary of State in this all-important question should have acted without receiving every possible assistance and information from those of long experience in public life shows a self-assurance almost sublime, or an ignorance of the situation almost unbelievable.

Our Mexican policy announced was:

First. That we would not recognize Huerta.

Second. That we would not intervene.

Third. That no foreign nation should be permitted to interfere.

In this circle we have been helplessly traveling ever since. Such policy was no sooner announced than every experienced man in diplomatic affairs knew that an irretrievable mistake had been made. It was only a few days before the President and the Secretary of State saw their humiliating error. Then Members of the House and Senate were consulted, but it was too late. There was but one way out, and that was to recede from the position taken; but the administration has not had the courage nor the patriotism to do this. This failure has led to all our present trouble. Instead of acknowledging their mistake and trying to recover from its effects, an attempt is being made to cover up these blunders with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

When the President informed Huerta that he must resign and that he must not be a candidate for reelection, and then added that he would not intervene to compel him to obey these mandates, the President placed himself completely in Huerta's power. By that declaration he placed the whole situation entirely in the hands of Huerta. From that moment the President has stood pathetically helpless. His "watchful waiting" was a euphemistic confession of complete failure.

It seems almost incredible that the President should have expected Huerta to comply with his demands. What reason was there to suppose that Huerta would take his orders from the President of the United States? The President for the moment must have confused Huerta with the Democratic majority. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The people of Mexico have been asking with great force what right the President has to dictate as to whom they shall select for President. If the President of the United States has a right to reject one, he has a right to reject all. If he has the right to say who shall not be President of Mexico, he has the same right to say who shall be.

While the President was pursuing the policy of "watchful waiting" and the Secretary of State preaching his policy of "peace" it appears that the other nations of the world have not been content. We told the other nations they must not interfere. They respected our position and left us the responsibility. Certainly we had no right to expect that the other nations of the world would be satisfied that we should abandon Mexico to its fate. Days, weeks, and months have gone by and there was no change. Pillage, rapine, plunder, and murder—all the hell of war—still devastates that unhappy country.

While the great premier of the Cabinet was for many weeks dividing the shekels and the applause upon the Chautauqua circuit with the tango artist and the Alpine yodler, the note from Japan of last August remained unanswered. Suddenly the administration was awakened from its serene dream of perpetual peace by a statement from Japan that there were "other ways" to settle disputes than by correspondence. Then the President became aware of the fact that Japan had taken advantage of his "watchful waiting" and Bryan's preaching of "peace" and had secretly increased her influence in Mexico.

In trying to extricate himself from this exceedingly humiliating position it appears that the President made another unfortunate mistake. He still held fast to his determination not to recognize Huerta nor to intervene. Conditions had grown intolerable. Then we permitted the sale of arms and ammunition to the insurgents. We openly gave encouragement to a highwayman and a common cutthroat in his career of pillage and murder. This recipient of our favor, in his program of promiscuous assassination, unfortunately showed the bad judgment to kill an Englishman. The administration at once found itself greatly embarrassed.

The State Department, I am informed, has a list of more than 100 American citizens who have been killed in Mexico, but the complacency of the administration has remained undisturbed by these foul deeds.

The President at last saw the dreadful shadow on the Pacific. The Benton murder gave England the opportunity. The price of England's friendship is the equal use of the canal.

Then the President discovered for the first time that the act of Congress giving American ships in the coastwise trade the right to pass through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls was "in plain contravention of the treaty." The plain truth is that the President refuses to turn from his untenable position in Mexico, but prefers to come before Congress and ask us to join him in a proposition to trade the Panama Canal for England's friendship. The plain truth is that the President fears Japan and wants the influence of England, and he is willing to pay the price. Why should not the President try the very remedy that he prescribes to Congress and "reverse his action" without raising the question whether he was "right or wrong." Certainly, his pride of opinion is not worth a great deal more than the Panama Canal. If the other nations of the world are disgusted with our foreign policy, is the canal the only specific? Why not try trading a resonant vacuum for a secretary of state? That ought to help some. The President and the Secretary of State have been greatly overmatched in the game of international politics. They have been disgracefully defeated by the man they despised. Courage and action have triumphed over dreams and theories. The humiliating truth is that Huerta has lost us the canal.

The prayer of every patriotic citizen is that war may never come. But if war does come with Mexico no human intelligence can tell what the end may be. No imagination can comprehend its awful cost. It will be one of the greatest calamities in the history of civilization. But if it does come the obstinate refusal of the administration to consult with experienced and patriotic men in official life, the theatrical disregard of precedents by the President for publicity purposes, a ruling desire for popular applause, will be most largely responsible. The administration has had a free hand in this matter. They have seen fit to consult none. Responsibility for the present policy rests upon them alone. "Watchful waiting" has changed to wabbling weakness.

It is useless to discuss the question as to whether or not the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has been violated. That is no longer the important question. Whatever our views may be, it is certain that it was not this phase of the controversy that caused the present action of the President. The question as to whether or not the treaty had been violated was passed upon by the Democratic Party and repudiated in its platform. The question was passed upon by Congress, and after extended debate its solemn decision was recorded into law. The question was passed upon by the American people and overwhelmingly repudiated at the polls.

In using the treaty now the President is only seeking some plausible way out of the difficulty into which his own blunders have led him. He is using the treaty in an effort to conceal, so far as possible, the "matter of nearer consequence."

The President says in his message that in his judgment the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls is "in plain contravention of the treaty." In view of the declaration of his own party platform, written by his own Secretary of State; in view of the declaration in President Taft's message upon the same subject; in view of the opinion of Secretary Knox; in view of the decision of the Supreme Court upon this precise question; in view of the opinion of a great majority of the bar of this country; in view of the opinion of many of the most eminent lawyers of England and Germany; in view of the expressed admission of Great Britain in her correspondence upon the question; in view of his own speech made when a candidate for election; and especially in view of the solemnly recorded judgment of Congress into law, after full debate, in addressing the Congress and saying that the law we had enacted is in "plain contravention of the treaty," certainly there was no delicate insinuation of lack of judgment or patriotism on the part of Congress and no display of sublime certainty as to his own position.

If the law is in "plain contravention" of the treaty it was in plain contravention of the treaty on August 16, 1912, when he made his speech commending it and seeking votes by such commendation. If so, it was in plain "contravention of the treaty" when his party wrote the platform that he accepted and upon which he was content to be elected. If so, it was in "plain contravention" when he wrote his letter of acceptance. If so, it was in "plain contravention" when he made his campaign and was appealing to the American people for support upon this proposition.

Why did he keep silent, then, when it was his duty to speak? Will his friends claim that he was justified in doing then what his honor as President will not permit him to do now?

If it violates the treaty to pass ships of commerce through the canal, it is absolutely certain that it violates it to pass through it a naval vessel. If war now comes on the Pacific, we must pay a toll to pass our battleships through our own canal on American soil to defend the attack of the enemy. We would even be compelled to pay for the privilege of passing our vessels of war through the canal to defend the canal itself from destruction. It is certain that if it violates the treaty to pass ships of commerce through the canal, then it also violates the treaty to fortify the canal. Shall we now abandon this undertaking also to pacify Great Britain and to help cover up our blundering foreign policy? It is also certain that if it is a violation of the treaty to pass ships of commerce through the canal it is also a violation of the treaty to let Panama pass her vessels through the canal. Will we now repudiate our treaty with Panama, weak and helpless, to pacify some other nation that we fear? Where will be the end of this pusillanimous policy of surrender?

The President declared in his speech, in defending the law that he now denounces, that the Democratic platform was not "molasses to catch flies." If it is not made of molasses, what is it made of? If it was not made to "catch flies," what was it intended to catch? Where now are the "earnest and honest men" he so highly commends so bravely standing upon this magnificent structure? Do our Democratic friends see anything prophetic or personal in his dramatic declaration that "gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat"? What do they think of his statement that the American people are now "taking notice" of those who talk one way before election and act another after? I especially commend these statements to the consideration of the American people in connection with the attitude of the President and the Democratic Party upon this question.

What is this thing of "nearer consequence" of which the President speaks? What is it that disturbs him? Suppose we do not repeal the provision, what, then, is going to happen? Is England going to demand that we give her the right to an equal use of the canal, and force compliance? Is she going to defy the Monroe doctrine if we do not? Is she going to demand reparation for the death of Benton unless we repudiate our former action? Is she going to secretly encourage Japan to attack us unless her demands are met? What is this trouble of "nearer consequence"? Is this simply an adroit and rhetorical figure of speech to coerce Congress, or does it really mean that some great danger threatens us? Are we a Nation of cowards, that we will yield before we even know the danger that threatens us. [Applause.] Why should the President ask Congress to yield the rights of our country without giving us the entire truth? Why should he keep from Congress the facts in such great national emergency? Why should not Congress and the country know the entire truth in matters of such great concern? Is Congress to do nothing in the matter but weakly to submit to the President's wish without asking why? This is the most remarkable position ever taken by an Executive in the history of the Nation. Can it be that the President has come to look upon Congress as merely the stupid instrument to record his will?

The President did not think it worth while to discuss the reasons for his attitude or to give the House the facts in regard to "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence." He did, however, discuss with newspaper correspondents, at least, what he did not mean by that expression. He did not even go that far with Congress. But newspaper correspondents are not pleading for patronage. Evidently, the President was sure of his ground. Evidently he was right. It is neither necessary nor profitable to reason with a coward.

The attitude of the President would indicate that he considers that he not only has the judgment and the opinion of the majority in his care and keeping, but also their consciences and their intellectual integrity. The truckling servility, the indecent haste shown by the majority to do his bidding largely justifies the opinion held by the President.

But, say some of the followers of the President upon that side, it is a high and noble and patriotic duty to change our attitude, to repudiate our former opinions and our platform and follow the appeal of the President. They tell us that it takes great intellectual and moral courage to thus face about and stand for the right. But this assumption of intellectuality and "high-browed" superiority will deceive but few. More than 2,000 years ago it was written, "The ass knoweth his master's crib." The Democratic Party is soon to demonstrate that it is still worthy of its illustrious prototype. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

We have lived to see the imposing spectacle of the President of the United States, not asking, but supplicating the Congress of the United States to directly repudiate a plank of the platform that he had especially approved, and upon which he was elected, and one that brought him thousands of votes. We have lived to see the inspiring spectacle of a Secretary of State enthusiastically applauding the repudiation of the plank in the platform that he himself wrote by the candidate he nominated upon it. Mr. Bryan's opinion of "embezzlers" at that moment must have been above par.

We have lived to witness the inspiring spectacle of a Secretary of State sitting in the diplomatic gallery of this House, surrounded by the representatives of other nations of the world, enthusiastically applauding a proposition to barter the interests of his own country in an attempt to cover up his own stupid blunders. [Applause.]

To any man in this body, to any man who knows our great and loved Speaker, who knows his courage, his patriotism, his intellectual integrity, it is unthinkable that he should come before the assembled Members of Congress and plead that they should violate his party's platform and sacrifice his country's interests to cover up his own mistakes. The people of this country are beginning to realize more and more as the days go by what this Nation lost when, by the most supreme exhibition of human selfishness and ingratitude in the history of American politics, CHAMP CLARK was robbed of the nomination at Baltimore and prevented from being President.

Who can imagine the admired and trusted UNDERWOOD ever seeking and receiving votes upon a platform, then repudiating that platform and asking Congress to join with him in a policy of abject surrender? It was CHAMP CLARK and OSCAR UNDERWOOD more than any other two living men who made possible the great Democratic victory the last election.

As a Representative and as an American citizen I congratulate the country that the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]; that the able gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. FITZGERALD]; that the brilliant gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]; that the calm and powerful leader of the majority [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and our great and patriotic Speaker [applause], who by every rule of right and justice should be in the White House to-day [loud applause]—I congratulate the country that these men, the real leaders of the Democratic Party by election and by ability and not by Executive order—I congratulate the country that these men refuse to repudiate the platform upon which they were elected; that they refuse to betray the people; that they refuse to cowardly surrender the interest of their own country. I congratulate the American people that these men are Americans and that these men still control their own votes. [Applause.] Every American citizen is proud of these real leaders of the Democratic Party.

England on the Atlantic and Japan on the Pacific, the great shipping nations of these two oceans, wanted to use the canal without the handicap of American competition. Japan threatened, England demanded, and the President became the instrument to carry out this international confidence game. The transcontinental railroads never for a moment abandoned the fight. For this reason their influence went to Wilson in the election. They had been defeated in their effort to prevent the construction of the canal. They had been defeated in their fight to control it. But Democratic success brought them new hope. The action of the President has not come as a surprise to those who have been watching recent events. Words of praise have been coming from a great railroad builder for this administration. He has recently been giving out interviews praising the President and telling of the glorious prosperity that was soon to bless the country. It has been evident for some time that the transcontinental railroads had found in the President a sympathetic listener. So, often defeated, they have at last found their champion and have won. The President has joined hands with the Canadian Pacific Railroad and the American transcontinental lines to keep up freights, to perpetuate monopoly, and to defeat the will of the American people.

In view of our unconditional and discreditable surrender to England and the railroads, it would hereafter be in order to first submit all our proposed legislation to the British Parliament for its approval. It would save our country much shame and humiliation and the President much pain and anxiety.

Hereafter the Democratic Party, in national convention assembled, should first consult King George and the transcontinental railroads as to what they wish placed in the platform. It would be more expeditious and much fairer to the American people and much less embarrassing to self-respecting Democrats.

After this bill is passed a petition should at once be prepared and submitted to the other nations of the world asking them to agree upon a program for celebrating the opening of the canal and requesting them, if consistent, to permit the United States to participate therein, and at least give us the privilege of paying the bills.

Immediately upon the passage of this bill I suggest that it would be in order for the gentleman from Georgia, the distinguished chairman of the committee, to introduce a resolution regulating the use of the letter "h" in our vocabulary. This would be a delicate and diplomatic way to show our fine appreciation of the sensibilities of our new-bought friend.

If this bill is passed, it would be better for the Pacific Northwest if the giant locks were by some mighty force moved from their firm base and the canal blocked forever. The benefit that would come to us from the canal is to be taken from us and given to British Columbia and the transcontinental railroads. But what are the interests of the Pacific coast compared with the friendship of England and influence of great railroad magnates? I am one man from the Pacific coast who has never publicly talked war with Japan. I have never thought that it was for the best interests of the country to agitate this question. I have sometimes thought that we have not always shown that proud and sensitive people the consideration that we should. We on the Pacific coast know and appreciate the power of the wonderful Japanese Empire. We do not underestimate what war with Japan would mean. We do not underestimate the courage and the bravery and the patriotism of that remarkable people. We know that in many ways we would be greatly handicapped in a contest with Japan. We know that upon us would fall the heat and the heaviest burden of the contest. The people of the Pacific coast realize these things as the people of the other portion of the country do not realize them. But the people of the Pacific coast are neither weaklings nor cowards. They do not share the dread of Japan shown by the President, nor the abject fear of Japan shown by the Secretary of State. If it is a question of national dishonor or war, the people of the Pacific coast are ready to fight now. [Applause.]

We shall soon witness the power of patronage discreetly distributed. [Applause.] We shall witness the triumph of partisanship over patriotism.

To-day we are paying the price of scholarly obstinacy, of textbook statesmanship, of sublime self-assurance, of Chautauqua methods, of grape-juice diplomacy.

On the roll call of this bill let the flag of the Capitol fly at half-mast to commemorate the first cowardly surrender in our country's history.

But when before have we been compelled to purchase friendship? When before have we been compelled to buy influence? When before have fear and blundering brought our country to such low estate?

I for one refuse to remain silent and see the Pacific coast robbed of the advantage of the canal for the benefit of British Columbia and the transcontinental railroads. I refuse to see without protest, in shame and humiliation, the cowardly surrender of the interests of my country to purchase the friendship of Great Britain and to cover up the egotistical stupidity of this administration.

I have no doubt of the correctness of my position upon this question, but if I did I certainly would not resolve that doubt in favor of Great Britain. I admit that there is something within me that responds to that grand old toast:

My country, may she ever be right; but right or wrong, my country.

[Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington yields back two minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I have heard so many expressions of ill feeling and have seen such bitterness displayed in the debate in this House for the past two or three days on the pending measure that I have almost come to the conclusion that at the present time this is no place for a minister's son. [Laughter and applause.] This whole controversy, in my opinion, is only a tempest in a teapot, and in a few weeks it will practically be forgotten and the Democratic Party will get together and stand together and—

"We will all be happy yet,
You bet!"

[Laughter.]

The distinguished gentleman who preceded me [Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington] perhaps thought he was giving this House some new and startling information when he declared that the ass knows its master's crib. [Laughter.] I have no doubt but that the gentleman is perfectly competent authority [laughter] on the subject of asses, because for many long years he kept his nose in the Republican crib. And another young gentleman from the billowy and bounding West [Mr. LAFFERTY] [laughter] a few minutes since, in a speech on the floor of this House, bobbed around like a tomtit on a pump handle [laughter and applause] in an alleged criticism upon the conduct of the President in this Panama-tolls controversy, and also gave us a dissertation upon the subject of autos.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Airships.

Mr. THOMAS. But the young gentleman in his vehemence mistook his activity for intelligence, and I will venture the assertion that he does not know a carburetor from a blowhole. [Laughter.] I only wish that I had just about an hour to talk this morning, as I believe I could make the Republicans who have suddenly taken such pretended interest in the welfare of the Democratic Party sit up and take notice. [Laughter.] I voted against the rule, because I thought it was unnecessary. I have no complaint to make against any man who voted for it, because I recognize the fact that every man has a constitutional right, and it is his duty, to vote as he thinks best on every subject. When I look upon the other side of this Chamber and witness the apparent intense anxiety of the Republicans in this House which has suddenly developed for the welfare of the Democratic Party and the entity of its platform I know at once that a "nigger" is concealed somewhere in the Republican woodpile. I do not intend to go that route, but will travel another road and cast my vote in support of this bill [applause] and, if you will have it that way, in support of the views of the President, because I believe he knows more about what is proper to be done in this matter than all of the Republicans put together who are opposing this measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair wishes to admonish the Members that it is improper and against the rules for them to sit in their seats and interject words or remarks into the speech of a gentleman who has the floor. It is not fair and it is not in good form, and, as the Chair has stated, it is against the rules.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. [Applause.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I do not think my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] was justified in criticizing the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I wish the gentleman from Washington had had 10 or 15 minutes more. In that event the vote on this side of the House would have been unanimous and the vote on that side would have been split worse than it will be split. [Applause.] We have learned in this House that when the gentleman from Washington speaks we are about to learn what the Shipping Trust wants. So far as the issues in this case are concerned, they have been clarified by his address to an extent which renders it impossible for any Member to be mistaken hereafter.

Mr. Speaker, I presume the gentlemen who oppose this bill are anxious that the Nation should take them and their utterances seriously. As I have listened to this debate I have felt that either gentlemen had lost their sense of humor or imagined that the American people could no longer recognize a joke when they heard it.

Let us consider the case of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER], who on Saturday last entertained the House with a revival of that sterling old American melodrama entitled "Twisting the British lion's tail," with himself in the stellar rôle of tail twister in chief. As a curtain raiser for the main event he gave us "Me and Woodrow Wilson." "Twisting the British lion's tail" is high tragedy, but "Me and Woodrow Wilson" is low comedy. "Me and Woodrow Wilson," we are told, is the product of the gentleman's own brain; he wrote every word of it, and it provided the only touch of originality to illuminate his entire speech. You will recall how, looking as much like the strenuous Teddy fresh from the jungles of South America as it is possible for a man from West Ninety-ninth Street to look like the hero of San Juan Hill, he declared that he did not question the veracity of the President of the United States. That was a most generous concession, and I thank the gentleman for his forbearance. From the way he started I imagined he would slam the President of the United States into the Ananias club before he had had the floor five minutes. While the gentleman would not question the President's veracity, he tells us he does question his judgment and his courage.

Question Woodrow Wilson's courage! Ah, my countrymen, that was a jocular remark. In this day and age the man who questions the courage of Woodrow Wilson must either be a humorist or must be willing to write himself down as ignorant of the history of his own times.

WOODROW WILSON'S COURAGE.

I would remind the gentleman and his associates on the other side of the aisle that the distinguished citizen who now occupies the White House is the same Woodrow Wilson who, as president of Princeton, tore down the walls of caste and drove snobs and snobocracy from that great institution of learning.

This is the same Woodrow Wilson who, as governor of New Jersey, on the very threshold of his political career, wrested a senatorial toga from the grasp of Boss Smith, and declared that the man who had betrayed Democracy in the great tariff fight of 20 years ago should not be again permitted to practice his treason in the greatest legislative body on earth.

This is the same Woodrow Wilson who, when the Underwood tariff bill was under discussion in this House, overthrew the Sugar Trust and the Woolen Trust, the twin trusts that for a half century had constituted the keystone of the arch of protection. So powerful were these monopolies that the mighty Theodore during all the years he was in the Executive Mansion never dared to raise a finger against them; and Taft—your Taft, my Republican friends—confessed himself impotent in the presence of their influence.

This is the same Woodrow Wilson who, after 16 years of Republican shilly-shallying, directed the hosts of Democracy in their assault on the citadel of the Money Trust, and through the enactment of the Glass-Owen currency bill transferred the control of the finances of this Nation from the Morgans, the Stillmans, and the Bakers to the hands of the representatives of the American people.

This is the same Woodrow Wilson who, when Mexico was rent by revolution, stopped his ears to the clamor of the "jingoes" and refused to sanction a policy which would have crimsoned the deserts of Mexico with the blood of the flower of American youth in order that the concessions purchased by the Hearsts and Guggenheims from old Porfirio Diaz might be protected.

And this is the same Woodrow Wilson whose courage is questioned by the distinguished gentleman from New York. If any fact has been established by the events of the last 12 months it is that in the advocacy of what he believes to be the right Woodrow Wilson fears neither man nor devil, foreign foe, domestic enemy, or party traitor.

FAVORITE OF POLITICAL VAUDEVILLIANS.

So much for "Me and Woodrow Wilson." Let us for a moment consider that theatrical antique entitled "Twisting the British lion's tail." This has always been a prime favorite with political vaudevillians. In our fathers' time it was used as a companion piece for that other political melodrama entitled "Waving the bloody shirt." The present generation has seen little of it, and when the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] dragged it out of the attic of discarded issues the other day it seemed to me that the odor of moth balls clung round it still. James G. Blaine once tried to win the Presidency with it; Conkling essayed the leading rôle on one or two occasions; but statesmen who valued the good opinion of posterity rejected it as something unworthy of their talents.

In the last generation it was used to catch the Irish vote, and that is why it has been revived on this occasion. Of course gentlemen are not frank enough to boldly avow their purpose on the floor of the House, but you hear it talked in the lounge, in the cloakroom, and in the lobbies of the hotels. Gentlemen of the opposition chuckle gleefully and pat each other on the back as they tell how they will fool the Irish vote by this tale of a Democratic President truckling to British influence.

I warn the gentlemen, however, that they sadly underestimate the intelligence of the men of Irish blood who are citizens of this country. The Irish have quick tempers, but, thank God, they have keen wits, and they can not be caught by the chaff gentlemen are spreading before them. Instead, they will resent this arrogant affront to their intelligence and they will chastise the cheap demagogues who seek to play upon their feelings in the hope that passion will drive reason from her throne.

I am bound to the people of Ireland by the tenderest of sentiments. My father fought for Irish freedom, and when he lost fled to this country with a price upon his head. I know the Irish people would make any sacrifice that men should make to gain freedom for the little green isle. But they can not be turned from their lofty pursuit to be used as tools by an avaricious Shipping Trust which is seeking to occupy Uncle Sam's property without paying rent. A cause must be an evil one, indeed, when it is driven to so questionable a defense.

A SORDID ISSUE.

In my judgment, a more sordid issue was never presented to the representatives of the American people. The question before us becomes a very simple one when stripped of the claptrap with which gentlemen attempt to conceal it.

Do we believe in ship subsidy or do we not? That is the question and the only question before this House.

For a hundred years we have protected our coastwise shipping. Only boats owned by Americans can trade between American ports. Until a few years ago these boats not only had to be owned by Americans, but they had to be built in American shipyards. We were told that this policy would result in building up an American merchant marine and in affording competition between water transportation and rail transportation. What has been the result? Taking advantage of our generosity, the owners of these ships have combined with the railroads and there has been no genuine competition. The Shipbuilding Trust has seized upon these regulations to increase the price it charges for building ships for the American trade, and the Shipping Trust, after paying the extortion of the Shipbuilding Trust, has proceeded to unite with the railroads to rob the shippers of this country.

But gentlemen say that if we remit the tolls at the Panama Canal the railroads will be compelled to lower their transcontinental rates, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission is clothed with authority to compel competition between the water routes and the rail routes.

The answer to that is that freight may be shipped from New York by water through the Panama Canal to San Francisco for less than one-half the cost of transporting the same freight between New York and San Francisco by rail, and if the boats are compelled to pay tolls in the canal the cost will still be 40 per cent less by water than by rail. Genuine competition between the water route and the rail route would therefore result in the transfer of every pound of "slow freight" from the railroads to the ships without the remission of tolls or any other form of subsidy.

In the face of this fact the claim of the shipping monopoly that it must have free tolls in order to compete falls to the ground, and the proposition presented for our consideration becomes at once a question of whether we shall permit the Shipping Trust to add $1,500,000 to its annual dividends or whether we shall place that sum in the United States Treasury to assist in defraying the expenses of operating the canal.

"OUR SHIPPING."

And that brings up another point, Mr. Speaker, which has not been given much consideration during this debate. This canal cost $400,000,000 of American money—your money and my money, and the money of every man, woman, and child in this Republic. The cost of maintaining the canal is estimated at $25,000,000 a year. It is believed that we can not collect more than $12,000,000 in the form of tolls, and that the American people must be prepared to meet a deficit of approximately $13,000,000 a year. Why should all the people be taxed to meet this deficit while the men who use the canal are not charged a penny for the privilege? But they say it is our shipping trade. Whose shipping trade? Does any gentleman pretend that these ships belong to the American people? I can imagine the reception gentlemen would receive if they were to go down to the docks and lay their hands on some of this coastwise shipping and demand that they be given their interest in the ships. They would soon discover that these were our ships only when it came to paying tolls and that they were the ships of the coastwise shipping monopoly when it came to collecting freight charges and distributing dividends.

Instead of further pampering our coastwise shipping, I trust the President will assist us in amending the absurd navigation laws which protect this monopoly. The American shippers should have the right to patronize any ship that sails the seas. At the present time if a lumber merchant in the State of Washington wants to ship a cargo of lumber from Portland to Boston, he can only ship it in an American ship. In other words he must pay toll to the Shipping Trust. But if his Canadian competitor, just to the north of him at Vancouver, desires to ship a cargo of lumber to Boston, he can send it through the canal in the ship which offers him the best terms without regard to the flag it flies. The future of American commerce demands that we shall favor shippers more and monopolies less.

DEMOCRACY'S FUTURE.

Our Republican friends are gleefully announcing that this Panama Canal tolls question is the rock on which Democracy will split. I am not disturbed by the prophecy, because during the past 12 months I have heard it repeated not once but many times. When Wilson was inaugurated gentlemen declared that the President and his Secretary of State—the mighty Commoner—could not dwell together in concord for more than three months; yet Bryan still presides over the State Department, and apparently his relations with the President are more cordial, if that were possible, than they were on the 4th of March, 1913.

Gentlemen were equally certain that the forces of Democracy would go to pieces during the tariff fight. We were assured that the Woolen Trust and the Sugar Trust controlled enough Senators to emasculate the bill after it had passed this House and had gone to the other end of the Capitol. Again the prophets were confounded. Instead of emasculating the tariff bill the Senate strengthened it.

Nothing daunted, the prophets of evil declared that we would surely meet our Waterloo when we attempted to pass a currency bill. Had they not struggled with the problem for 16 years, and had they not failed? How could we hope to succeed where they could not make good? But we did succeed, and the best banking and currency bill ever enacted by an American Congress is now on the statute books.

Then gentlemen on the other side of the aisle prayed for a panic with more ardor than the farmers of Kansas ever displayed when they were calling on high heaven to send rain. But the panic did not come, and in despair our friends turned to the administration's foreign policy. They insisted that we must send an army into Mexico to protect the smelters of the Guggenheims and the ranches of the Hearsts. They were willing that 10,000 American boys should die to make a Republican holiday. But again they were disappointed.

Like the poor devil who seeks water in Death Valley, they have pursued every mirage which could be fashioned by brains unbalanced by hope too long deferred, and on each occasion, just as their fever-cracked lips were about to touch the limpid stream which flowed down a grassy bank beneath the shadow of a great rock, the vision vanished and they have been left to perish in the sands of disappointment.

I esteem it a great privilege, Mr. Speaker, to be permitted to cast this vote to-day. When I return to my constituents in Colorado I want to be able to say to them that on this eventful day, when the battle lines were forming, I found on one hand the black flag of special privilege and under it the remnants of an army which once followed Cannon, Barnes, and PENROSE; that on the other hand I saw the white banner of the "new freedom" and under it the militant hosts of progressive Democracy, led by Woodrow Wilson himself; and I want to be able to say to them that at that supreme moment I cast my lot with Woodrow Wilson and his policies.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, long before "the spirit of '76" was invoked to cover a raid on the Public Treasury for the benefit of the coastwise shipping monopoly it was my privilege, my pleasure, and my duty to vote against the exemption from tolls payment granted in the Panama Canal act.

In speeches I made in 1912 I advanced two reasons why the exemption should not be granted. They were, first, a jealous regard for the honor of my country, and, second, hostility to subsidy in any form. If there had been no treaty obligation whatever, I should still have opposed any payment out of the Public Treasury, whether made directly or indirectly, for I am much more concerned for the welfare of the people than for the prosperity of our only law-made trust and monopoly.

I had carefully read and reread the whole series of treaties from the beginning of the consideration of the transisthmian question with New Granada, Nicaragua, and Great Britain clean down to that with Panama, and I had reached the conclusion that we were solemnly covenanted to treat all countries alike in the matter of tolls for the use of the canal.

The treaties say that "all nations" shall be treated alike in the charges to be made for the use of the canal, and I could not convince myself that the phrase "all nations" meant some nations.

To reach any other conclusion requires, it seems to me, the reading into the language of those treaties a meaning that the authors did not intend to put there and that scholars, public men, and learned lawyers like Mr. Joseph Choate, who helped to write them, say is not there.

Perhaps no living man is so well qualified as Mr. Choate to interpret these treaties. His long and distinguished career, his great and patriotic services to his country, his unimpeached private character, and his almost unchallenged leadership at the bar give him a position which is unique.

The English foreign minister of that day is dead; John Hay, our Secretary of State, and Lord Pauncefote are dead. Choate alone of all these great men who had to do with the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty remains. Few men have greater skill in the use of English words or more clearly understand their meaning than he. He is authority in this matter.

Although it has been published many times and quoted in debate just as often, what he has to say will bear repeating, for they are the words of the highest living authority. Here, in a summarized form, is what Mr. Choate has to say as to our obligations under the treaties:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

That is what the treaty says. In the canal bill the clause covered by Mr. ROOT's motion to amend by striking out is this:

"No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Can you put those two things together and reconcile them in any possible way? Of course it is an utter impossibility, and even Mr. Douglas has not ventured to show how the two could by any possible construction mean the same thing.

No newspaper, no President, no public authority whatever that I have heard of, has ventured to take the plain words of the treaty and the plain words of that clause of the canal bill and say that the two mean the same thing.

I hope you will give Mr. Douglas a chance to expatiate further beyond his half hour to show how those two things mean the same thing. If he can convince you of that he will carry his motion to lay upon the table; otherwise not.

I venture to say now that in the whole course of the negotiation of this particular treaty no claim, no suggestion was made that there should be any exemption of anybody. How could there be in face of the words they agreed upon? Lord Pauncefote and John Hay were singularly honest and truthful men. They knew the meaning of the English language, and when they agreed upon the language of the treaty they carried out the fundamental principle of their whole diplomacy, so far as I know anything about it, and in the six years I was engaged with them their cardinal rule was to mean what they said and to say what they meant. [Applause.]

They had something to guide them. You will remember that in the previous year there was a canal treaty arranged between Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote which was so amended in the Senate that another treaty was negotiated and substituted for it and took final form in the treaty that is now under consideration. Mr. Cushman K. Davis, who was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, made a report which was very direct on this particular subject, and I read now from Mr. ROOT's argument in the Senate delivered very recently.

"In view of that report"—the report of Cushman Davis—"the Senate rejected the amendment which was offered by Senator Bard of California, providing for preference to the coastwise trade of the United States."

That is pretty direct authority, is it not? That motion was made in the Senate on the discussion of the previous Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which never was finally approved by the Senate. This is the amendment which was proposed: "The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of trade in favor of the vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade." That was pretty direct, was it not? Mr. ROOT adds:

"I see the Senate rejected that amendment upon this report which declared the rule of universal equality without any preference or discrimination in favor of the United States as being the meaning of the treaty, and the necessary meaning of the treaty." That was something they had to act upon; and there was a great deal else besides.

From the time that this question of a canal through the Isthmus, or a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific, whether through the Isthmus or by way of Nicaragua or Tehuantepec or anywhere else, was agitated, the universal declarations of public men, of Presidents and Secretaries of State, and other public men on both sides of the Atlantic, were to the effect that the canal, if it ever should be built, should be built for the benefit of mankind on principles of universal equality of the vessels of all nations, and without any discrimination in favor of any.

Another thing: They had a direct ruling of our own Government under the treaty of 1871. That was the treaty, you remember, under which the Alabama claims were finally disposed of. They inserted in that treaty as one of its later clauses a provision almost exactly like this, bearing on the same subject in respect to the canals that constituted a part of our great waterways through the Lakes, the Welland Canal on the British side, and the St. Clair Canal, I think it was, on this side; and it was stipulated in that treaty, as I recall it—you gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong—that the vessels of both nations should have equal rights without discrimination, and have the right to use the canals on both sides for their traffic on terms of complete equality and without discrimination in favor of either. After a while our Government found that Canada, although charging 20 cents per ton, I think it was, the rate fixed by the treaty or by the agreement between the two Governments, was remitting on its own traffic in Canadian vessels to Canadian ports 18 cents and remitting nothing on American traffic to American ports passing through the same canals, the result of which was that while our traffic paid 20 cents the Canadian traffic paid only 2 cents. This being brought to the attention of the Government of the Dominion, that exemption was abandoned; they took the American view of the subject, and from that day to this the vessels of both nations have passed through these canals on terms of perfect equality.

These are the words of a great and patriotic citizen, a great lawyer, and a diplomatic officer who served his country with distinction. What the world had to give him he has received. He stands on the mountain top of human existence, and his only political aspiration now is to see his country take the right position on this question, to tread the path of honor by keeping its plighted word.

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that gentlemen who are usually calm and clear-sighted can be, even for a moment, deceived by this factitious appeal to traditional political prejudices. Behind this mask of made-to-order patriotic fervor crouches the form of monopoly, law-made monopoly, fattening on the people through exorbitant charges that no competition can interfere with and greedy to add to its earnings. I am not willing to increase its gains by imposing needless burdens on the taxpayers. It is not the branch of our shipping which should be subsidized if any is to be. It is protected from competition, its profits are guaranteed by law, while our ships engaged in foreign commerce fight for existence under adverse conditions. The statutes—the protective-tariff statutes—prevent competition from foreigners, and behind that wall of advantage this coastwise shipping has organized a trust which divides up the business of the country. Galveston, New Orleans, Savannah, Charleston, Norfolk, and Baltimore each has been assigned to some one branch of this greedy trust which gentlemen here seem so eager to shower favors on.

Let me suggest to them, Mr. Speaker, that this pet trust can be helped in another way. Force it to pay the ordinary tonnage tax for the use of the canal, as it should do, and then offer a bill to reimburse it out of the Public Treasury by a direct appropriation.

That is precisely what the exemption law proposes to do, only indirectly and with the idea of deceiving the taxpayers. Will any Member of this House who opposes monopoly and subsidy, or says he opposes them, offer such a bill?

Much stress is laid on the obligations of the platform. Ordinarily it is a serious obligation; but, like everything else human, it sometimes goes wrong. We all know the circumstances under which they are made, how planks drawn for a special interest are sometimes presented by a few cunning and wide-awake men in the early morning hours or as the convention is drawing to a close, the members exhausted and no one paying much attention to anything but the absorbing work of selecting candidates. Conventions are not deliberative bodies, and since they abandoned the wise policy of limiting platforms to a declaration of political principles they are not entitled to the consideration they had in the old days.

If platform demands are always to become legislation, then conventions should sit for months and the delegates be carefully chosen by qualified electors; in a word, they should supersede the Congress. The Baltimore platform did say—

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

That was a declaration of policy, and a mistaken policy. In the second paragraph above it there is a declaration against bounties and subsidies, which is a good old Democratic principle. The policy announced was for subsidy. The principle of the party reannounced was against subsidy, and being driven to a choice I stand with the fathers of my party and against special favors.

There has been repeated reference to the fact that the President has changed his mind; that at one time he stood for exemption and now opposes it. Well, what of it? Has not he a right to change his mind if he sees that he has been in error? Is it not a sign that he is a bigger and broader man than even his friends had thought him? Besides, it is a revelation. To learn that the President can and will change his mind is both surprising and gratifying, and justifies this whole controversy.

He was wrong when he made the speech to the New Jersey farmers, but he is everlastingly right now, and he speaks out like a man. We ought to be proud of the fact that he has the courage to come out openly and correct an error previously made.

Mr. Speaker, the same two reasons that controlled my vote against exemption in 1912 do so still. I stood then for what I thought was national honor and economic soundness, and I do now. I shall gladly vote for the repeal. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CARR].

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, the exemption of American coastwise vessels from the payment of Panama Canal tolls has precipitated a great international question. The good faith of this Nation has been questioned by the action of the last Congress, and we are now to determine whether that action will bear the scrutiny of our more mature judgment. No legislation by the Congress in a generation is of such universal concern. The canal is soon to be opened, and the great problem of its building has been supplanted by that of its control. And just as we solved the former problem we shall likewise solve the latter, and in its solution there will redound to this Nation that honor and esteem which alone can afford satisfaction to any national achievement.

We are about to open the Panama Canal—about to dedicate it as this Nation's inestimable gift to the peace and commerce of the world. The impossible has become a reality, and the dream of the centuries fulfilled. We look with wonder upon our achievements much as did Balboa—

> * * * When with eagle eyes
> He stared at the Pacific, and all his men
> Looked at each other with a mild surprise—
> Silent, upon a peak of Darien.

Almost since the time of the discovery of the Pacific Ocean the eyes of the world have been turned to Panama. Commerce has eagerly looked forward to the day when the 8,000 miles around the Horn would be saved to the world's trade and the impassable barrier between the oceans removed. The history of the various enterprises formed for the purpose of building a canal is well known. The innumerable lives and the countless treasure sacrificed in this work are among the unhappy annals of the earlier projects. All were abandoned in the belief that nature would not permit such liberties, and that Panama would continue to challenge and defeat the hopes and aspirations of the master builders of the world.

But, Mr. Speaker, a new power was to be reckoned with. The indomitable spirit that subdued this continent and made it to blossom as the rose, the genius that made possible our internal improvements, the courage that wrested from the forces of nature the secrets of sanitation, and the enterprise that subdued rivers and mountains were yet to be summoned to this undertaking, and a new chapter was to be written in the unperishable annals of the achievements of this Nation. That accomplishment has been told in song and story, and will continue to be told so long as our country endures.

Mr. Speaker, the canal is soon to be opened and, as I have said, we are met by a great international question concerning its control. This question resolves itself into two propositions, and, briefly stated, are these:

First. Have we the right under our treaty obligations to exempt coastwise vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls in passing through the Panama Canal; and Second. If we have this right, is it a wise economic policy to exercise it?

In the consideration of this first proposition it is necessary that we examine the various treaties under which we acquired authority to construct a canal in a foreign land. As early as 1826 an international American conference was held at Panama. Henry Clay, then Secretary of State in the Cabinet of President John Quincy Adams, in a letter to that conference said:

> A cut or canal for purposes of navigation somewhere through the Isthmus that connects the two Americas, to unite the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, will form a proper subject of consideration. That vast object, if it should be ever accomplished, will be interesting, in a greater or less degree, to all parts of the world.
> If the work should ever be executed, so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefit of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

It would have been manifestly impossible for this Nation to have undertaken the work of building a canal at that time. Neither our commerce nor our resources would have justified it, and we then had no coast upon the Pacific demanding our protection. Nine years later, however, the United States Senate had this question under consideration, and in 1839 a resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives requesting the President of the United States "to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with those the jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus and of securing forever the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations." This action on the part of the House resulted seven years later in a treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce between the United States and the Republic of New Granada, now the Republic of Colombia. To this treaty may be traced the origin of the interests and claims under which the United States has constructed the canal and is now in possession of the territory known as the Canal Zone. This treaty extended to the citizens of the United States all the privileges and immunities of commerce and navigation in the ports of New Granada that were enjoyed by the Granadian citizens themselves, and the United States was further guaranteed "the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that may now exist or may be hereafter constructed." In return for this concession the United States guaranteed to New Granada the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus and also the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada possesses over that territory.

Let us now look to the motive that impelled this action on the part of the United States. In 1842, four years prior to the making of the treaty with New Granada, the Webster-Ashburn treaty was negotiated, which settled our northeastern boundary. By this treaty Great Britain acquired Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Labrador, and what is now the Province of Quebec. In 1846, the very year of the New Granada treaty, the Oregon boundary had been settled, giving the United States that territory which is now Washington, Oregon, and Idaho. In 1848, two years later, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was signed as a result of the Mexican War and we came into the possession of California, Arizona, and New Mexico. At the time of the making of the treaty with New Granada negotiations were pending for the acquisition of all the territory above recited except, of course, that acquired by reason of our conquest of Mexico. With prophetic eyes both Clay and Webster were looking to the future. They realized that it was only a question of time until the dominions of the United States would extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific and that it was the part of statecraft to provide the very best means of communication between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. With the exception of Alaska and the Gadsden purchase continental United States embraced the same territory at this time that it embraces to-day. The need of coast defense, the requirements of commerce were relatively as great then as they now are, and in conformity with the rapid progress which the United States was making in every field of human endeavor the Government sought to shape its economic and domestic policy.

When again the United States began the consideration of this matter it found that Great Britain was in possession of certain parts of Central America. She held the territory extending along the coast of Guatemala, or British Honduras, the island of Rutan, and other Bay Islands, and she also had a protectorate over a long stretch of Nicaragua called the Mosquito coast. Her personal relation with the people of Central America was very close and her occupation of British Honduras dated back to the year 1786. In addition to this Great Britain was a Caribbean power. She was in possession of the Bahamas and Bermuda, Jamaica, Trinidad, the Windward, and the Leeward Islands. In this situation it would have been manifestly impossible for the United States to have undertaken the work of the construction of a canal without at least the moral support of Great Britain. Had we believed that our treaty with New Granada vested us with authority to build and protect a canal on the Isthmus of Panama there would have been no necessity for seeking a treaty with England, as we subsequently did. American diplomacy was looking to the future. Such negotiations as were then made contemplated alone the acquiring such territory and consummating such treaties as might be necessary ultimately to permit the actual work of constructing a canal. Our policy was one of creating neutral territory and prohibiting, if possible, the establishing at the Isthmus of absolute control of any foreign power. This was doubtless the policy of Great Britain; also her ships were carrying the greater part of the world's commerce and her possessions in Central America were secured in order that she might have a voice in any project to construct a canal.

In 1850 we proposed that Great Britain should unite her interests with ours, in order not only that the canal might be built upon fair and equitable terms, "but that its construction should inure to the benefit of all nations and should offer equal opportunity to the commerce of the world." We invited Great Britain to enter into a convention for this purpose, and she consented. The United States, with certain privileges on the Isthmus of Panama, and Great Britain, in possession of the eastern coast of Nicaragua, were the two nations in position to undertake this work when the time should be opportune. Accordingly, Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, the British minister, and Mr. John M. Clayton, Secretary of State, met at Washington, D. C., and after mature consideration concluded what is known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, April 19, 1850. This treaty, therefore, forms the foundation of the understanding between the United States and Great Britain, and provides for the absolute neutrality between them in regard not only to the protection which they united to give to an interoceanic communication that should be established, but also agreed that both Governments should approve of any charges or conditions of traffic that might be imposed, and that no such charges or tolls should be imposed without the approval and consent of both Governments. It should be understood that at the time of the negotiation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the Nicaragua route was generally conceded to be the most feasible one, and Great Britain was in possession of the Atlantic outlet of that route. The treaty provided that either nation was permitted—to enter into treaty negotiations with such of the Central American States as might be deemed advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind on equal terms and of protecting the same.

The United States, in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, believed that it had entered into a compact that was both just and equitable toward both parties, and out of that treaty would ultimately come an interoceanic canal. Both Great Britain and the United States believed further that they would have equal rights in a canal regardless of which one of them should build it, and it was this assurance and belief, as set forth in the treaty, that induced Great Britain to surrender every interest she had in Central America. Moreover, the United States gave up nothing it then held. Great Britain, however, surrendered its right or protectorate of the Nicaragua coast and what was then supposed would be the eastern terminus of the canal. The position of the two countries was then one of absolute equality.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that the subsequent treaty made by the United States with Great Britain, to which I shall shortly advert, did not change this essential provision of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It matters not that the canal was finally located on the Isthmus of Panama. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not contemplate its location alone in Nicaragua, but extended to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway across the Isthmus which connects North and South America. In the eighth article of that treaty is written this covenant:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulation to any other practical communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects north and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

That article, Mr. Speaker, extends to an interoceanic canal wherever it may be located. It agreed that the parties constructing or owning the canal "shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve." This treaty recognized Great Britain and the United States as having equal rights in an isthmus canal route. If either built the canal, approval of the other should be necessary in the imposition of charges and conditions of traffic. If the right to build a canal held jointly by them was granted to any other country, the approval of both Great Britain and the United States concerning the charges and tolls to be imposed was to be made a part of any such grant. Then, too, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was under consideration, Mr. Rives, representing this Government, was directed to say and did say to Lord Palmerston, in urging the Clayton-Bulwer treaty:

The United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind.

We appreciate, Mr. Speaker, our obligations under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and we were ready likewise to enforce our rights. We contended that by the provisions of the treaty Great Britain had promised not "to make use of any protection or alliance which it either has or may have with any State or people for the purpose of fortifying or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, or the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same. This was going somewhat beyond what the British Cabinet had expected in entering into the engagement and a good deal more than it was willing to concede, but in the end we won our contention, and England not only acceded to our demands, but gave up its rights in British Honduras, Mosquito coast, and the islands of the sea.

It will be observed that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated the construction of a canal, either jointly or separately, by one of the two nations to that treaty. England was willing to join with us or she was willing that we should build the canal alone. Some years later the United States felt that it was in position to build the canal, and suggested to England a new treaty to supersede the old one, in order that provisions might be made for new conditions and for the beginning of the work. Accordingly, Lord Pauncefote, the British ambassador, and Mr. John Hay, Secretary of State, negotiated what is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, at Washington, November, 1901.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided that the United States and Great Britain—

being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end remove any objection which may arise out of the convention * * * called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, agreed that, "the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of April 19, 1850, * * * that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and that, "subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government, the United States, shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." And in order to make plain the understanding between ourselves and the British Government, with whom we were dealing, we made this specific stipulation (article 3):

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war to all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

The article here quoted contains the essential provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as modifying the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The latter treaty was made, "Not only to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle."

What was the particular object? Certainly, the building of a canal. What was the general principle? Certainly, the principle of neutrality, which, as applied to this treaty, means that there shall be no discrimination and that both nations shall be upon equal terms and that the rights of one shall equalize or counteract the rights of the other. Neutral means "neither for nor against," and it can only be applied in the interpretation of a treaty, as I have indicated.

This treaty, Mr. Speaker, provoked some discussion in the Senate when it was under consideration there. Senator Bacon, of Georgia, on December 16, 1901, offered an amendment to strike out certain words of the preamble, as follows:

Without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

The Senate, however, refused to strike out these words, thus recognizing the principle of neutrality as provided in the treaty. More than this, Mr. Speaker, in that same debate in the Senate, and concerning this very treaty, Senator Bard, of California, offered this amendment:

The United States reserves the right to the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

The adoption of that amendment and its acceptance by the British Government would have settled forever this question. The matter was squarely before the Senate. Here were two amendments, one by Senator Bacon and one by Senator Bard, either of which would have taken the question beyond the realm of speculation. And yet the Senate rejected both amendments by an overwhelming vote.

Thus by our treaties solemnly made, the arguments which induced their making, their interpretation by the Senate of the United States, and the common practice affecting like water communications we are in conscience bound to repeal the free-tolls enactment of the last Congress that we may again enjoy the confidence, respect, and esteem of the nations of the world.

In our Declaration of Independence we courted "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind," and appealed to the world for the justice of our cause and the rectitude of our conduct. We were then weak, we are now strong, and the most courageous thing a strong man or nation can do, when in the wrong, is to acknowledge the wrong and make reparation. As a Nation we can not live unto ourself alone.

The advocates of free tolls argue that the "canal is ours and therefore we have a right to exempt our vessels from the payment of tolls, and that such exemption concerns us alone." The fallacy of this proposition is apparent. True, we built the canal, but we built it under the stipulations of the treaties I have mentioned, and its use is subject to the covenants of these treaties. There is therefore no merit in the argument that because we improve the inland waterways of the Nation and permit their free and unrestricted use the same freedom should be given to the Panama Canal which we built. The rivers and harbors constituting our inland waterways were not improved under any treaty stipulations. Moreover, if the same policy is to be applied to the Panama Canal as is applied to our rivers and harbors it would be impossible for us to collect a dollar in tolls from any source from transportation through the canal. The canal would be a perpetual charge upon the Government of the United States.

In addition to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have two other treaties—the one with New Granada and the one with Panama—which made the Panama Canal an international waterway to be operated under the terms of these treaties with equal treatment to all nations under binding covenants which are the essence of the treaties. The Suez Canal was built by private enterprise in a foreign country under a concession. The Panama Canal was built by the United States in a foreign country and under contracts with foreign governments, and both are international waterways. How impotent, then, is the argument that the Panama Canal should be subject to the same regulations affecting our inland waterways.

The opponents of this repeal speak of our coastwise vessels as if they were the property of the United States. We might as well speak of our railroads as belonging to the United States. Both the railroads and the ships are controlled by corporations earning dividends for their stockholders, and there is no reason why either should be subsidized at the expense of the people.

I believe these considerations, Mr. Speaker, to be sufficient to justify this repeal. If they are, the question of their repeal or retention as an economic policy is of no concern. The plighted faith of the Nation is beyond all other considerations. I desire, however, in the time remaining to me to discuss the question as an economic proposition.

Free tolls is in effect a subsidy to the coastwise ships of the United States. There is but one argument by which the advocates of free tolls seek to justify it as an economic proposition, viz, that it would afford competition between water and rail transportation and thus reduce freight rates. The coastwise ships of the United States that have occasion to use the canal will by that use save about 8,000 miles in a voyage from coast to coast. The imposition of a charge of $1.20 a ton on coastwise freight is relatively very small when compared with the cost of making a voyage around South America. The canal will save several dollars per ton in transportation to every coastwise vessel using it. Many of the ships engaged in the coastwise trade are owned by the railroads. The railroads could not compete with the canal in carrying freight across the continent, but they expected to use their own coastwise ships to drive competition from the canal and then raise the freight rates on the canal to the level of railroad rates, just as has been done elsewhere. This situation was met by the eleventh section of the canal act by forbidding railroads subject to the act to control or hold any interest in ships which compete with them. As a matter of fact, there can be no competition between independent ships engaged in the coastwise trade and the railroads, because the reduction of cost by reason of the saving of distance will be far below the possibility of railroad competition. Touching this question the report of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee says:

Our railroad-owned ships having been excluded from competition in our waters, and the water route having been shortened 8,000 miles, freight rates between Atlantic and Pacific ports should be reduced far below the possibility of railroad competition on their own tracks, unless the steamboat companies decline to compete with one another through the canal, in which case rates will be arbitrary, being placed just enough below the railroad rates to command the business, or unless there should be fierce competition between rival lines to cut freight rates very low, in both of which events the payment of tolls by the coastwise ships would be entirely immaterial to the shipper or consumer. The charge of $1.20 a net ton, which, on an average, would be about 50 cents a freight ton, or about 2½ cents per 100 pounds, would make very little difference in cost, even if the shipper or consumer were given the benefit of it. But if 2½ cents per 100 pounds is material and tolls collected of only half of the ships that pass furnish a given amount of revenue, suppose that instead we collect uniform tolls of all the ships; then 60 cents per net ton or 25 cents per freight ton, or 1¼ cents per 100 pounds, would produce the same amount, and the tolls would hurt nobody. It ought to console those who must give up the fond theory of toll exemption that it is better for all the people to bear half the burden of tolls than for a privileged class to be given half of the entire revenue as a largess, while all the public make up the deficit in the Treasury by paying a double toll.

Mr. Speaker, the coastwise trade of the United States is now prosperous. This portion of our merchant marine does not need strengthening, as we have 24,765 ships now engaged in this trade. Ten per cent of that number will be sufficient to carry the trade through the canal. More ships are now building and there is no reason why they should be subsidized. The merchant marine that needs strengthening is that portion now struggling to build up a foreign trade. If tolls were exempted from coastwise vessels the revenues necessary to operate the canal would have to be collected in part from our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade, and these ships are now bearing a too heavy burden. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee further reports:

As it is probable the coastwise ships will require about half of the lockages for the first five or six years, and it is estimated that $5,000,000 will be required to pay expenses, not claiming anything for interest on the cost of construction, it is estimated that the half from the ships paying tolls at $1.20 per net ton would be about $2,500,000 per annum, and the United States Treasury would have to pay out of the people's money the other $2,500,000 to pay for locking through the canal the vessels of the special interests.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party has always opposed ship subsidies or gratuities of any kind. The Panama Canal must be maintained. It has cost now about $400,000,000. We must pay the interest on the outstanding indebtedness made necessary to build the canal. Then there will be the cost of its operation and the maintenance of the fortifications. The canal will effect an average saving to coastwise ships of approximately $6 per ton. Surely they could ask no more, and there should be no objection to the payment of $1.20 per ton at the canal. Furthermore, when it comes to a question as to whether this money should be paid by the people whose bounty has made possible this enterprise, or whether it should be paid by the direct beneficiaries of the canal, there can be to my mind but one answer.

It has been argued that inasmuch as the Democratic national platform adopted at Baltimore declared in favor of free tolls, we are in duty bound to support that platform, and it constitutes a binding pledge upon us all. As a general proposition, Mr. Speaker, this is true. But no one here would argue that a platform promise has any binding effect if it should be found to violate a treaty. Treaties have all the force and effect of law. In fact they are at least in morals superior to the law as they are not only covenants which receive the Nation's sanction, but they are international in scope and character. The most that the Baltimore platform intended was to declare the party's belief in free tolls as an economic proposition. I believe that such declaration was ill advised and without the consideration the facts warranted.

When the bills exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls passed the House in the Sixty-second Congress, a majority of the Democratic Members voted against it, but it was passed by practically the united vote of the Republicans. The House was Democratic, and it is altogether probable that the subcommittee in framing the Baltimore platform believed that it was commending the action of the Democratic majority in the House, when as a matter of fact that majority was opposed to free tolls. Moreover, in the campaign of 1912, it can not be said that the question of free tolls was an issue. The all-important and consuming question was the tariff. The Democratic doctrine of more than a hundred years, declared in innumerable platforms, can not be swept away by a single declaration amounting to little more than obiter dictum. Had this question been a vital issue; had it been the subject of even general comment, its binding force now could not have been challenged as a tenet of Democratic faith, and it would have had the support of the Democratic Members of Congress, provided, of course, that it did not conflict with our treaties with other nations.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that honest men may differ in this, as they differ in other matters. Even believing, as I do, that free tolls violates every Democratic tradition and that it is an unwise economic policy, I should be constrained to follow my platform and hope that the next convention would rectify the error. But believing that such legislation is a plain violation of a sacred pledge, I shall vote for a repeal of this law.

I am in favor of encouraging our commerce, so far as a due regard for the rights of all the people will permit. I would like to see the sails of our commerce whiten every sea—the American flag in all the waters of the world. We have contributed our genius and wealth to this end. And this hope will one day be realized, not by granting subsidies or special privilege to one class at the expense of another, neither by sharp diplomatic practice that may gain us a temporary advantage. But it must come to us as a nation by the observance of these strict and inflexible rules of conduct that attend individual success and the adoption of an economic policy that will establish reciprocal trade relations, permitting a free exchange of these products in which the nations of the world respectively excel.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I represent some 400 miles of Pacific coast, but can not agree with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] as to the unanimity of sentiment on the western shore that would lead to subsidies to hampering foreign commerce and to the violation of treaties. At the last election I fought this out, and the fact of my being here shows the view of my constituents. A nation should make few treaties, should make them definite, and should live up to them. There is in treaty-making too much of the Spanish grandee idea of presenting everything and the expectation of a refusal to accept of the gifts. A nation, like an individual, should make few promises and should punctiliously keep those that are made. I consider this matter one of national honor, not one of yielding to a foreign nation, but of preserving our own self-respect, of keeping our word. It is not a factional matter, not a party matter, and not a sectional matter, and if my constituents had such a device as a referendum and should have demanded of me that I should cast my vote contrary to my belief, I should cast that vote as their vote, not as my own vote, and then should be inclined to resign my job, were it not for abandoning a contract to my district.

This free-tolls proposition is economically unsound, as the President has well said. Nearly two years ago I took the ground that I now take. No one can say that I am following the dictation or even the suggestion of our great President. I am glad that he agrees with me. I am glad that he is right, as I have found him right so far in every great measure he has advocated. [Applause.]

This free-toll matter is to my mind nothing less than a subsidy, a subsidy [applause] masquerading under all sorts of nonsense, miscalled patriotism, nonsense wrapped in flags and punctuated by squalls of the lion in torture and by squeaks of the eagle in triumph. It is a plain, ordinary attempt to secure a donation of money for the benefit of the coastwise shipping interests. Whether they constitute a trust or not, I do not know. In any event, I can not see where the consuming public will get any benefit whatever from this remission of tolls, which will amount to from 40 to 60 cents per ton on merchandise. In the first place, the tolls on most commodities will amount to so little that they will be lost in the shuffle before ever the consumers are reached. On coal and lumber they will amount to a great deal to consumers, but doubtless there will be commodity rates to care for these items. On sea competition the rates will be so far below the railroad rates that I can not see how the railroads would be benefited at all by the retention of these tolls, except on such items as coal and lumber, that should pay only a low commodity rate, and with such a commodity rate the railroads would not be permitted to overcharge.

Now, as to this talk about platforms. It seems to me that we have had sufficient trouble in trying to amend the Constitution in the last few years. Has it come to a point where the Democratic platform or other platforms are but other forms of constitutions to bind our legs and arms, to tie us down, and to make us powerless when we desire to do a right thing?

I can not understand how those men who disbelieve in the protective theory, who disbelieve that the foreigner pays the tax, who disbelieve in subsidies of business—I can not conceive how any such men can stand for the anticommercial argument involved in penalizing and destroying foreign commerce and in subsidizing domestic commerce. The Nation owes part of the charges of the canal as payment for the national defense. Aside from that, the cost of maintenance, the bond interest, and a sinking fund is a proper and a righteous charge on commerce, both foreign and domestic. It is absolutely unfair to charge a deficit which might be met by coastwise tolls to the entire Nation, much of which can never benefit by cheapened freights if ever the coastwise shipping parts with even a portion of its subsidy.

If ever in the cause of national defense we grant ship subsidies, let us grant them frankly, and see to it that our flag floats over free men, and able men, disciplined men, and men adequate to man our Navy. Let us give subsidies, if at all, to sailors and not to shipowning corporations.

We need coal on the Pacific coast. Welsh coal will burn just as well as West Virginia coal, and Welsh and other foreign coal will come to us cheaply if we give it a chance. We want low and equal rates on both coal and lumber, and you of the Atlantic coast need lumber, and I presume can use foreign lumber just as well as Pacific coast lumber from the United States.

To my mind the issue is perfectly clear. I am sorry I have not been here to gather inspiration from these debates, but I have been unavoidably absent.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to vote as I voted two years ago. No argument has been adduced to show that I was then wrong. I am glad to stand by the President, because I believe that in morals and in economics he is in this matter, as he has been all along, right as I have been given to see the right. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am obliged to him. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY] is recognized.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the duty of the American people to govern this canal to their own best interest is paramount to any other right or power which they have in the canal.

The legal and moral right of this Government to exempt from tolls American-owned vessels engaged solely in coastwise trade has been thoroughly thrashed out on both sides on this floor. All this is illuminating, but is of little practical value in deciding this question. I am one of those who hold we had the right to pass the act exempting American-owned vessels, and believing at that time that we did have the right, I voted for the act as it passed.

However, no man ever does exercise all the powers that he has the legal or moral right to exercise. No business interest, if it is wisely conducted, ever does go the limit of its rights or its powers. Men regulate the exercise of these functions according to the utmost general good which will follow such exercise.

There has been a great deal said on this floor about the benefits to the commerce between our States. Let us look at it for a moment. The mere fact that we are able to collect tolls of any size is all the evidence we need that in doing so the interest that pays the tolls is enabled to, in some way or other, reduce its charges by an amount even greater than the tolls which we expect to collect.

Let us see who is going to benefit by remitting the tolls. It must be one or more of five classes of people—the producer, the carrier, the middleman, the retailer, or the ultimate consumer. If I had the slightest suspicion that the ultimate consumer of this country would get the benefit of this remission of tolls, I would again vote for such remission. I do not believe the profits of the retailer need any legislation for their advancement nor do the profits of the jobber. The transportation companies may need it, but if they do I would as soon vote for a direct subsidy as to give them the benefits of exempting them from paying tolls. My own experience leads to the belief that unless the producers were in a gigantic combination, a combination so large that it might run its own vessels, there would not be a Chinaman's chance for the producer to get any benefits whatever.

If we find that these tolls work injury to American interests, we can remit them at any future time.

I refuse to allow any man to put into my mind subservience to England or any other country by my vote on this subject. I have sense enough to know that when two men enter into a controversy over some act of the first to which the second takes exception, if the second is able to damage the first in an equal or greater measure, the first is usually wise enough to modify his position, providing no principle is at stake, and there is not any such principle involved in this question. The mere statement on this floor of an overenthusiastic partisan that a vote to repeal the tolls exemption is allowing England or any other nation to govern this canal is absolutely and totally at variance with the facts, and if England or any other nation sent her request on a battleship, or hinted that it would be backed by bayonets, I want to think that there is not a man in this House who would not vote to continue the policy of free tolls to American-owned ships engaged solely in the coastwise trade. No such thing has occurred or will occur, but in the international relations the friendship of other nations frequently is of great advantage, and particularly, as in this case, when it is a mere question of choice whether that $1.20 per ton be remitted and goes into the coffers of the Coastwise Shipping Trust, or if it be added and thereby the transcontinental railroads get a little more freight that they otherwise might lose. For the benefit of my Democratic friends, my judgment is that it will be very much like the Underwood tariff. The total cost of bringing the article from the beginning of production to the consumer is somewhat reduced, but neither the consumer nor the producer shares in the benefit.

The President is the one man who ought to know more about these international relations than any of the rest of us. He can not take all of us into his confidence during the progress of negotiations, and it is childish for anyone to think that he can or ought to do so. I believe if any of us could take the time to thoroughly hunt up the records for the past few years we would find leaders of both sides of this House expressing exactly opposite views at various times as to what the President ought to do, according as they were in harmony or antagonistic to the President.

President Wilson, on the 5th of March of this year, used these words:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

No one doubts the President's honesty or his sincerity of purpose. He may have made a mess of the Mexican question. He may have gotten himself and his administration into something of a hole; but I would not know, nor do I think anyone else in this House would know, it at the present stage of development. He is solely responsible for the foreign policy of this administration and for its relations with other Governments; and inasmuch as I can not see where anyone who needs to benefit and who ought to be benefited might suffer one way or the other by the charging or the remitting of these tolls of $1.20 per ton, I believe it is my duty to vote with the President in this matter, irrespective of any general party tendency or even of any party platform. Why, when the party platforms were written there was no hint of international complication, and the platforms could not have foreseen it. The party platform, in some particulars, resembles the Constitution of the United States. Many of us hold that the Constitution could not have provided a remedy for all evils, many of which could not have been in contemplation in the minds of men when it was framed; and so with the party platform.

If the President is still of the mind that it will be an aid to him in international relations, I am going to vote to sustain him. If he has changed his mind since his message of March 5 and has not informed Congress, he is not the honest man I take him to be. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the other side will control some time. I am considerably ahead.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I was much impressed a few moments ago when the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] called the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] the Cassandra of this side of the House. Of course the gentleman from Texas is more familiar with the classics than I am, but my recollection is that Cassandra was a woman. [Laughter.] And not only that, but she made direful prophecy that Troy would fall, and her prophecy came true. [Laughter and applause.] I commend the gentleman from Texas to a fresh reading of the classics. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the situation here confronting us can be stated in comparatively few words. In May, 1912, this House voted for free tolls on our coastwise vessels going through the Panama Canal. On July 2, 1912, two months later, the Democratic national convention at Baltimore unanimously declared for free tolls on such vessels. On July 8, six days later, the British Government sent its first note and admitted that the United States had a right to exempt from tolls coastwise vessels going through the canal. [Applause.] That was on the 8th day of July. The very next month—August—after this British note was written, the Senate passed and the President signed the bill, and in signing it attached a memorandum saying that he had no doubt that Congress under the treaty had a perfect right, just as the British Government had admitted in July, to pass a law permitting coastwise traffic to go through the Panama Canal free of tolls. But now the President says—and I quote verbatim from his message of March 5, the present month:

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong.

He asks us to yield, whether we are right or wrong, and for a reason he does not disclose.

When in the history of free government did any code of ethics call upon a man of honor to yield what he believed to be right and best for his country at the mere request of any man, even though he be President? [Applause.] When did any principle of international law require a nation to reverse its action upon a great question which concerns all the yet unknown future of the nation's life without inquiring whether it is right or wrong, and at the mere request of a rival, interested nation? Was any proposal so extraordinary ever before presented to the Congress of the United States? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for one minute.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen talk about "subsidies." And yet practically all of you gentlemen across the aisle voted for the river and harbor bill. It appropriates millions to improve rivers and harbors in your respective Southern States. Every canal made, every harbor improved, every river canalized, is to be free of tolls. Then what is it that has made this exemption of American coastwise vessels in the Panama Canal from the payment of tolls a "subsidy"? We have expended $100,000,000 in the improvement of the Mississippi River, and we appropriate a million dollars a year for maintenance. Let any of you gentlemen who shout "subsidy" rise here and point out the difference between sending ships laden with flour down the Mississippi from Minneapolis or St. Paul to Memphis, to Vicksburg, to New Orleans, free of tolls, and sending the same ships through our canal—a canal built on land for which we paid $10,000,000, a canal that cost us $400,000,000 to build, which we fortify at an expense of $35,000,000—sending ships through that canal on up to San Francisco or Seattle, free of tolls. If it is not a "subsidy" down the Mississippi River it is not a "subsidy" through our canal. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, under the rule granting leave to extend remarks I here quote from the RECORD of May 21, 1912, what I then said on this subject of "subsidy" during the debate on the canal bill:

"Mr. Chairman, I have been very much entertained to-day in observing the vigor and frequency with which the word 'subsidy' is being used here in an attempt to frighten gentlemen who believe that coastwise traffic in American ships through the Panama Canal ought to be free. Gentlemen shout 'Subsidy!' 'Subsidy!' at those of us opposed to tolls on coastwise traffic. As for myself, I have outgrown the age when a mere epithet has any terrors. 'Subsidy!' There is no more of subsidy in letting American coastwise ships go through that canal free than there is to letting them go from port to port down the Mississippi River free, the Government having expended approximately $120,000,000 upon that river for improvements, and now expending annually $1,000,000 in appropriations for maintenance. [Applause.]

"Wherein is there any distinction? If there be any distinction, let gentlemen point it out. Is it a subsidy to allow coastwise ships to go through the Soo Canal free or to enter New York Harbor free or to go down the Ohio River free? This word 'subsidy' has been used for over a hundred years in this country by those opposed to any Government system of internal improvements, and especially to improvements of rivers and harbors.

"It is the very argument that confronted Henry Clay and Andrew Jackson and other statesmen who believed with them that, on grounds of high public policy, this Government has the right to improve the waterways of the country, not because such improvement is for the benefit of any particular class of our citizens but because it cheapens transportation to all the people and so is for the good of all the people. [Applause.]

"Let any gentleman on this floor who says that we are 'subsidy' men distinguish between boats going free of tolls down the Mississippi from St. Paul to St. Louis or Memphis or New Orleans and letting them go free of tolls from New Orleans through the canal to San Francisco or Seattle. That canal is about 40 miles long. Suppose that it were cut through a range of hills 40 miles wide in Iowa. What, then, would be thought of a proposition to charge tolls, amounting to a tariff wall between different sections of this Republic? I am for protection against the poorly paid labor of China and the underpaid labor of other countries, but I am for absolute free trade between every part of the Atlantic and the Pacific coast line of the Republic of the United States. [Applause.]

"Putting tolls of $10,000 or $12,000 upon an American ship carrying American goods under the American flag going through that American canal is, in effect, only putting $10,000 or $12,000 of tariff upon the goods. You Democrats are accustomed to declare that the amount of a tariff on goods from Europe, if collected at New York, is added to the price of the goods. Is it not added to the price of the goods if collected at the Panama Canal on a ship going from New York or New Orleans to California? How do you Democrats answer that question? How do Republicans answer it—men who have always demanded free trade between the States?

* * * * * * *

"I have three times voted against ship subsidies. But the proposition before us is not one of that character."

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] is recognized.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the Panama Canal tolls question is one of grave concern to the people of this country. Not since I have been in Congress has there been such a division of Democracy on any great question that has come before this body. Upon the one side is now arrayed the President of the United States and a host of his followers in the House of Representatives. Arrayed upon the other side in this body are the real leaders of the Democracy, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK; the majority leader, Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama; the chairman of the great and powerful Committee on Appropriations, Mr. FITZGERALD, of New York; the chairman of the Democratic congressional committee, Mr. DOREMUS, and other Democratic leaders of power and prominence. It is a battle royal. The distressing harmony that has heretofore prevailed in the House of Representatives among Democrats from the time they came into power in the House, on March 4, 1911, down to now, has at last given way to division, charge, and countercharge. The Republican hopes of having a majority in the next House have gone up 50 per cent within the last 24 hours.

The Panama Canal tolls question was before the House in the month of May, 1912. At that time a majority of the House, but not a majority of the Democrats, voted for free tolls. To be exact, 87 Democrats voted for free tolls and 70 against it, while 76 Republicans voted for free tolls and 41 against it. In other words, a majority of the House voted that American ships carrying coastwise trade should pass through the Panama Canal, when constructed, without the payment of any tolls. The Panama Canal act carrying such a provision passed the House of Representatives on May 23, 1912. It later passed the Senate and became a law. Putting the stamp of approval upon what the House had done, the Democratic Party in national convention at Baltimore on July 2, 1912, embodied the following plank in the platform upon which President Wilson was elected:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The Progressive Party in its national platform in 1912 declared in favor of free tolls for American ships engaged in coastwise trade.

The Republican Party made no declaration upon this subject in its platform of 1912.

President Wilson, when he was a candidate for President, frequently indorsed the free-tolls plank in the Democratic platform.

At the time this matter was before the House in 1912 it was argued that we could not exempt our own ships passing through the Panama Canal engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls without violating our treaty with Great Britain, but the chief ground of objection then was based upon economic reasons. I voted against free tolls at that time, and if that was the only issue now involved in this controversy I would be inclined to vote the same way again, but things have changed. The issue is not now the same.

The Panama Canal will have cost the American people before it is finally constructed nearly $400,000,000. It will cost us about $16,000,000 annually in upkeep. There is only a very small percentage of the American people engaged in the coastwise traffic. There is not a man in the district I have the honor to represent who has one dollar interested in ships carrying coastwise trade. We propose to charge Great Britain and the other nations $1.20 per ton for the use of the canal. Until the canal is at least self-sustaining I felt, and now feel, that American ships engaged in coastwise trade should pay for the privilege of using the Panama Canal in the business in which they are engaged—that of coastwise shipping. We will not get enough in tolls to pay for the upkeep of the canal, to say nothing of the interest on the money invested. We do not permit any foreign nation to engage in any of our coastwise trade. All that under the law must be carried in American ships and by Americans engaged in the coastwise shipping. This is not all. Before the Panama Canal was constructed (and now, for that matter, because the Panama Canal is not yet in operation) it cost the coastwise shippers who wanted to ship a cargo of freight from San Francisco to New York, for example, by way of Panama about $4 per ton to unload freight, ship it across the Isthmus of Panama by the railroad there, and then reload it. Even if this Government should charge those engaged in coastwise shipping $1.20 per ton for carrying their freight through the Panama Canal when completed, we will have saved those shippers by constructing the canal $2.80 per ton. In other words, if we should charge them $1.20 per ton, as we propose to charge others, we will still have saved those shippers of our coastwise trade $2.80 per ton.

For all the people of this Government to expend $400,000,000 in constructing the canal and get no financial return from that very small part of our population using the canal in the coastwise trade does not strike me as a fair proposition; and not striking me as a fair proposition, I voted against free tolls before and would do it again, I think, if that were now the main question at issue, although the argument is not all on one side.

In behalf of free tolls it can be said that the Panama Canal is a part of our inland waterway system; that the Government yearly expends millions of money in the improvement and maintenance of our waterways; that no tolls are charged on any of our Government-improved canals, rivers, or harbors; that if we charge tolls on our vessels going through the Panama Canal we ought to charge tolls for the use of our rivers and harbors where Government money has been expended on them; that the principal reason for expending millions of dollars annually on our rivers and harbors is that it forces the railroads to reduce the freight rates so as to compete with cheap water competition and that in that way all the people are benefited; that free tolls through the Panama Canal would result in cheaper freight rates generally—but I fear there is not so much in that argument, because if the people got the benefit of it all it would only amount to 2 or 3 cents on the hundred pounds. It is also urged with much earnestness by those favoring free tolls that the transcontinental railroads will be compelled to lower their freight rates in order to compete with the lower water freight rates which free tolls will help to secure, but it must not be forgotten that citizens of foreign nations can not compete with citizens of our own country in handling our coastwise traffic, and it is by no means sure that those engaged in carrying our commerce from one American port to another would not put the change in their own pockets, and that the public would not reap the benefit to which it is entitled. If those engaged in our coastwise trade did not lower their freight rates by reason of free tolls—and it is by no means certain that they would do it—there would be no necessity for the railroads to lower their freight rates by reason thereof. And are not the railroads now demanding a 5 per cent increase in their freight rates to keep from going out of business, as they say, and is not President Wilson in favor of it? And I make the prediction that before many more moons the railroads will be granted a 5 per cent increase on freight rates. But many gentlemen are in earnest in the belief that free tolls through the Panama Canal will bring cheaper freight rates. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MANAHAN] the other day in a speech here excitedly exclaimed:

> Are the people yet awake to the meaning of this contest? Do they realize that it is the last desperate effort of the great railroads to maintain control of transportation and to hold the power of levying unreasonable freight-rate taxes upon consumers?

So the argument is not all on one side; but the fight we are now engaged in is not a question of tolls. It is a question of sovereignty.

After the House had passed the Panama Canal act, in May, 1912, and after it had become a law, Great Britain protested most vigorously against that part of section 5 of the Panama Canal act which reads as follows:

> No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

It will be remembered that none other than American vessels, or rather vessels floating the American flag, can be thus engaged, although the United States as a nation, of course, is not engaged in the coastwise trade—but only certain of our citizens. It is the English contention that that part of section 5 of the Panama Canal act which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from paying tolls is in open and flagrant violation of that part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, which reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

While Mr. Wilson and the Democratic Party before election declared for free tolls and approved that part of the Panama Canal act which provided for them, after election President Wilson and the Democratic Party changed its mind about it—or, rather, President Wilson changed his mind, and that changed the mind of the Democratic majority here. They were for free tolls before; they are against it now. Why has the President changed front not only as to free tolls but as to the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the United States over the Panama Canal? About the only reason given by the President for his change of position was in that part of his special message to Congress which reads as follows:

> I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it [free tolls] to me in ungrudging measure.

This means, of course, that England is demanding free tolls; that England's sympathy, if not support and cooperation, is desired, if not needed, in helping to extricate President Wilson and his Secretary of State from the entangling meshes of their weak and puerile foreign policy in dealing with Mexico. In other words, England is trying to enforce hard terms on the United States because of the unhappy situation with Mexico, caused by the "patiently waiting" policy of the Democratic administration with that country, which amounts to no policy at all. President Wilson apparently fearing that the British lion will shake his shaggy main unless his demands are complied with is ready to hoist the white flag and surrender. In fact, he has already surrendered, so far as he is concerned. And what has he surrendered? And what does he want Congress to surrender? Is it free tolls? Yes. Is that all? By no means. Free tolls amounts to a mere bagatelle, so far as this controversy is concerned. England wants us to surrender our sovereignty over the canal. She wants us to surrender our jurisdiction over it. She wants us to give up our right to say how the canal shall or shall not be used. She wants all nations to have as much right in it and over it as we have. That is what England's demand amounts to. That is what the President is willing to give up.

Senator GALLINGER said the other day:

> I will not discuss the absurdity of a nation spending $400,000,000 for a work which will not benefit it a whit more than other nations who have done nothing toward the project.

And it is absurd to ask the United States to let other nations share equally in the benefits of a project that cost us $400,000,000 and which cost them nothing. It cost no one of them anything. Not only are we asked to let other nations of the world use the Panama Canal on terms of entire equality with our own in times of peace and in commercial affairs, but we are asked at least by implication to let all other nations use the canal in times of war on terms of like equality. There is no doubt about this. That clause in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty about which the controversy arises reads:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

England's present contention is that her vessels of commerce shall go through the canal on terms of entire equality with our own. But the terms of this treaty apply to vessels of war no less than to vessels of commerce. The treaty between the United States and England, which is nothing more than a contract, says:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

By the words "all nations" we evidently meant all nations other than our own. England does not now, except by implication, make the contention that her vessels of war shall go through the canal on terms of entire equality with our own; but if we grant her contention that her vessels of commerce shall go through the canal on terms of entire equality with our own we concede that her vessels of war can do it, and that the war vessels of all other nations can do it, because the terms of the treaty apply equally to vessels of commerce and vessels of war. The treaty says:

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and vessels of war * * * on terms of entire equality.

If England's vessels of war can go through the canal on terms of entire equality with our own, that means in times of war as well as in times of peace. Then, if England's vessels can do it, so can the vessels of all other countries. Then, if the United States has no power to say what vessels shall and what vessels shall not go through the canal and the terms on which they can do it, we have no jurisdiction over the canal, and would have no right to fortify it. If we have no right to fortify it nor to use it differently from the other nations of the world, I would like to inquire why we expended $400,000,000 of the people's money in its construction? To follow out the contention of President Wilson and his followers to its logical conclusion shows how ridiculously absurd their position is.

It looks now that naval and not military warfare will be the kind mainly resorted to should the United States ever again engage in war with any of the great powers of the world. This would especially be true in a war with Japan. The Panama Canal will be our greatest asset in such a war. The western coast of California, Washington, and Oregon—in fact, our entire western coast, including Alaska—is now dangerously exposed to attacks of the enemy. No way to reach them without our ships going away down around Cape Horn, the southern extremity of South America, a distance of 8,000 miles. But with the canal completed, our ships and war vessels can be rushed through the Panama Canal in a few hours and into Atlantic or Pacific waters, as occasion requires. The Panama Canal is indispensable in case of war. It is our greatest and most valuable strategic point. In formulating the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the United States had no idea of letting the other nations of the world use the Panama Canal with its war vessels upon terms of equality with our own. If we did not intend it in case of war vessels we did not intend it with vessels of commerce, because vessels of commerce and vessels of war, by the terms of the treaty, are put upon the same footing.

Differing from the question that was before the House in 1912, when it was a question of free tolls, the real question now is a question of sovereignty. Shall the Americans hold or surrender the Panama Canal? That is the question.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], a Democrat who believes that party pledges are made to be kept and not to be broken, and who believes the President is wrong in his un-American spirit of surrender, happily expressed the real issue now before us in a speech a day or so ago, when he said:

There is a more serious question involved in the passage of this bill than the question of tolls. The right to discriminate in favor of our ships, the opportunity to encourage our shipping, and to increase our commerce are matters of vital importance, but they pale into insignificance when compared with the attack on the sovereignty of our country in the Canal Zone.

At another point in his speech he again said:

But we have yet to consider the most serious surrender that the advocates of the British contentions desire to make—that is, to make the admission that we are not sovereign in the Canal Zone. By your vote you are asked to ratify for all time to come the British desire that we surrender sovereignty of the Canal Zone and admit that it is an international waterway in which we have no rights that are not possessed by all other nations.

The ablest champion of the President's course on the floor of the House also recognizes that the issues before us to-day and those before us when the Panama Canal act was passed in 1912 are entirely different. In a speech the other day, in speaking of the tolls, he said:

These questions were important and controlling when the proposition was originally considered. They are interesting now, and I assume that gentlemen will occupy many hours in their discussion. But I sweep them all aside. In my view they are to-day wholly irrelevant and absolutely immaterial. Gentlemen who search for excuses to leave this exemption upon the statute books may discuss them with much learning and at great length, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has done, but they can hardly persuade themselves that they discuss the real question which now confronts us. The situation is materially different from what it was when the law was passed.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Republican floor leader here, during this debate, in one of the ablest speeches made on this floor for many years, said:

Personally I never have favored the exemption of the coastwise vessels entirely from the payment of tolls; but when it comes to a subsidy, which gentlemen talk so much about, what about the subsidy to foreign vessels? We know that when we operate the canal and maintain it and fortify it and put troops upon it to protect it and maintain the sanitation there we never will have tolls enough to pay back our expense, much less the interest on the investment, and to that extent we are granting a subsidy to the foreign vessels which use the canal [applause] * * * and if it is a subsidy to let American vessels go through, it is a subsidy to let foreign vessels go through; and if we grant a subsidy to the foreign vessel, is it just to refuse to grant it to the American vessel?

The gentleman from Illinois is not in favor of free tolls, and yet he has fought the bill now before us with all the powers of his great intellect and with all the force of his splendid manhood, because he realizes that the question now before us is not a question of tolls, but a question of sovereignty.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the great and, I am glad to say, impartial Speaker of this House, who is opposed to the President's un-American spirit of surrender, is not deceived about what the issues are here. He knows that it is not a question of tolls, but a question of American sovereignty over the canal. In his great speech here he said:

We want war with no nation; but rather than surrender our right to our complete sovereignty over every square foot of our globe-encircling domain we will cheerfully and courageously face a world in arms. * * * I would rather see the canal blown up than give the British control.

Further on in his speech the Speaker said:

The amazing request of the President for the repeal, like the peace of God, passeth all understanding. If he has any reasons which are not utterly untenable and which impelled him to make the request, he has not vouchsafed them to us as a body or, so far as I am informed, to any Member of the House. If he had adequate reasons and did not deem it prudent to make them known to the world at large, he could have communicated them to us in secret session. With all due deference to the President, it seems to me that we are entitled to those reasons before bolting a Democratic platform, which is generally considered an indefensible, an extra-hazardous, performance, frequently fatal in its results.

The Democratic platform on which President Wilson was elected declares for free tolls. And of all the Presidents we have ever had President Wilson ought to be the last one to violate a platform pledge, for after he was nominated and before his election he said in a speech on August 15, 1912:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to a very quiet and private retreat.

President Wilson's Secretary of State, Hon. William Jennings Bryan, has in his public utterances been very severe on those who violate party pledges. In a speech delivered May 13, 1913, he said:

If a man after his election finds that his platform contains something which he can not honestly support, what ought he to do? Violate his conscience? No. Then what? He should resign, and let the people select a man to do what they would have him do.

I desire to announce it as a settled principle not to be questioned in this country that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform.

But if correctly quoted by the New York American, Secretary Bryan is with the President in helping pass a law to violate a sacred party-platform pledge. The New York American quotes him as follows:

Q. Mr. Secretary, have you said anything on the tolls question?—A. I am for the bill, most heartily.

Q. Have you said that in any other public way?—A. I have said it in my paper.

Q. Are you in favor of the provision not to let them have any chance to amend it?—A. Yes; the resolution presents the issue.

Q. In other words, you are for it in every way?—A. Yes; unreservedly.

But I have long since learned that the Democratic Party does not possess the infallibility which it claims. It said, if intrusted with power, that it would reduce the high cost of living, but prices of the necessaries of life have been going up every day since it got into power. It denounced in its 1912 platform "the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses," and yet no Republican Congress has ever appropriated as large amount of money with which to run the Government as the Democrats have since they have been in power. I am not blaming them for this. It takes money to run this country; but I am blaming them for making false promises about it. I am digressing though from the matter before us.

It is bad enough for the Democratic Party to pledge free tolls in its platform and then to violate that pledge. The American people, though, might forgive them for that, but they will not forgive them for surrendering the jurisdiction, the rights, the interests, and the sovereignty of the American people over the canal, the construction of which is the most expensive, most valuable, most brilliant engineering feat of the world.

Senator GALLINGER, in a speech the other day, strongly put this point when he said:

If Great Britain has the right to protest the way in which the United States collects tolls, why has she not the equal right to suggest the form of government by which the canal should be controlled? Why should she not urge that we do away with a military government and establish an elective system?

Manifestly we have come to the parting of the ways. The United States must state to the world that she will manage the canal and arrange the tolls question as seems fit to her or she must submit to the eternal suggestions of powers who played no part in the canal's construction and are now trying to reap the benefit of something they did not sow.

Yes; we have come to the parting of the ways. The issue when this question was before us in 1912 was one thing; to-day it is quite another. It was then a question of tolls; it is now a question of sovereignty. Shall the United States hold and maintain the canal, or shall she surrender and abandon it?

That is the question. I am unalterably opposed to the un-American spirit of surrender. I shall cast my vote to sustain the American contention and uphold American interests and in opposition to the British contention and British interests.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] is recognized.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the history of this Republic the President of the United States appeared in the Halls of the American Congress for the purpose of advocating the cause and supporting the contention of a foreign nation, and to speak against the officially taken position of the country whose interests by virtue of the oath of his high office he was bound to protect.

The occasion was one of such serious import and nearer consequence to the Nation, so humiliating to her patriotic spirit, so un-American in expression, so subversive of the Constitution, and undermining of the popular rights secured thereby that the world may well voice their wonder at the spectacle and the people of the United States catch their breath in astonishment.

From the flotsam and jetsam of a once strongly championed but now discredited and derelict political document one may pick up this plank:

We believe in the preservation and maintenance in their full strength and integrity of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government—the Executive, the legislative, and the judicial—each keeping within its own bounds and not encroaching upon the just powers of either of the others.

Without giving a single substantial reason for the un-American request, the President precipitated the whole weight and influence of his high office as Chief Executive upon a coordinate—the legislative—branch of this Government and asked it to "reverse its action without raising the question whether it were right or wrong." "I ask you," said he, "for the repeal of the provision of the Panama Canal act which exempts vessels engaged in coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls."

Two momentous questions affecting the perpetuity of our Nation are thus thrust upon us—we are attacked at home and abroad. The President has asked the Congress of the United States to surrender its position as one of the three coordinate branches of the Government, charged with equal and special responsibility, to subordinate itself to that of the Executive. Such a suggestion is fraught with gravest danger to popular and representative government. It is a long and dangerous step toward monarchy. Already the Presidents of the United States have greater power than any constitutional monarch in Europe. This is an attack upon the functional authority of the legislative branch of this Government.

You, my colleagues, are thus asked to place the shackles upon representative government. You are now the defenders of the constitutional rights of the people. Will you fail and fail in this the most important hour in national history since the close of the Civil War?

Communications by the Chief Executive to the Congress, in person or by message, are for the purpose of informing Congress of existing conditions, that Congress, being informed, may with better judgment more wisely act. Under the original conception it was never intended that the President should formulate a legislative policy clearly within the province of the legislative body.

The Chief Executive has not afforded this Congress any information on the Mexican situation, or given it any facts upon which to support the remarkable legislative request contained in his recent toll speech. As a Member of this House, sworn to the performance of my duty as a representative of the people of my State, I have the right to know, and inasmuch as the President has seen fit to revive a custom wisely abandoned by the great statesman, Thomas Jefferson, of delivering his messages to Congress in person, I, for one, shall no longer content myself to sit still, but reviving another custom, shall, as occasion may require, seek courteously to interrogate the President, in order that I may with full knowledge of the facts be better prepared to perform my duty under my oath.

This year marks the consummation of the greatest engineering project ever undertaken. The Atlantic and Pacific are brought together. The great ocean highways have been recharted and the course of world travel has been changed. The map of the world takes on new importance in the face of this stupendous accomplishment.

The vast resources of this country have been poured ungrudgingly into the enterprise. The indomitable energy and perseverance of the American people, unaided by any other nation, has brought it to pass. Four hundred millions of money have been spent.

As Deity brooded over the chaos of the world, and said "Let there be light, and there was light," so in a finite way the American heart brooded over an interoceanic canal and gave the edict, "Let it be built, and it was built."

The dream of the ages awakens into reality; it is finished. The people of the United States have not been selfishly inspired—its beneficence is to be bestowed upon all the people of the world. They are invited to its use upon terms of extreme fairness and absolute equality.

It fulfilled the hope of President Grant, who said:

I commend an American canal on American soil to the American people.

Of President Hayes, who said:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to surrender this control to any European power. It is the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the Isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interests.

Of President Harrison, who said:

Our national policy now, more than ever, calls for its control by this Government.

Our pride and our rejoicings are disturbed even on the eve of our festivities. Having built the Panama Canal we are astounded to find it asserted that we do not own it. Having performed unaided this work of momentous importance to the world we are informed we may not control it. With a generosity never before contemplated in the history of the world, having tendered its use upon fair terms to the world, we are met with the astonishing objection that it is not ours to give nor for us to impose terms.

The discordant note comes from Great Britain. Now, in stronger terms than ever advanced by England, the President of the United States adds his voice. When we ask why we may not control or direct or manage the canal which we built and which we supposed we owned, it is answered because "it is nominated in the bond"—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901.

If this be so, if the American people have been deceived, if they have been led into the expenditure of a sum taxing the imaginative to comprehend, if this great amount has been spent on a faulty title, if they are to be dispossessed of sovereign and exclusive rights because of a "hard bargain" in the interest of a nation having no equitable, even if it may have a technical, standing for its claim, it will be serious indeed.

The American people never so understood, nor would they for a moment have sanctioned the expenditure of their money had Great Britain's present contention been known to them. If misunderstandings must arise, I propose to keep faith with my own people, whose equitable position in this matter is unassailable. If honor is involved, the honor of a man's own household is of first concern.

Mr. Speaker, I am not of those who have a pristine feeling of antagonism against Great Britain; I am of the number who believe that the two English-speaking nations have much in common. Their history, ancestry, tradition, and common purposes have largely intertwined. I have had dreams of these two great nations, each preserving the dignity of their several sovereignty, yet traveling hand in hand in aiding each other in the fulfillment of great and in part common destiny.

None more than I have rejoiced at the changing sentiment of our people, which with each passing year has grown more friendly to Great Britain.

Let me speak in friendly warning words which I wish would pierce the walls of the embassy in Washington and reach the ear of the British Government in London. I would not make them words of threat, but words of solemn prophecy. The passage of this bill and the surrender of that which the people at large will ever believe to be their rights will prove a costly victory to Great Britain. It will be as dangerous to her ownership as though it were the pound of flesh on Antonio's breast.

Yes, Great Britain may win this unequal fight and sustain this "hard bargain," but that which has disrupted a great political party will foment public opinion and sentiment of this country which will require years to mollify.

In this England will set back the dial of American friendship 25 years. It will cost her more than she can hope to gain. She may win under the powerful influence of the President, "because the law allows it and the court awards it." But from the gaping wound which she thus makes will ooze out from the heart of the American people that which has taken years to create—their friendly and sympathetic interest in English national well-being.

The Panama Canal, wrested from our control, will not be a place of pride, but, like the draped Strassburg monument, it will be a perpetual reminder of a loss of our national dignity under a hard contract which enabled British diplomacy to reap where it had not sown.

Since the close of the last administration Great Britain has made marvelous headway in her contention. On November 12, 1912, Sir Edward Grey had suggested in his note to this Government:

Recognizing that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they (His Majesty's Government) desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration.

Prior to that, in an official note dated July 8, 1912, Mr. Innes, British chargé d'affaires, said:

If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Here was an official admission on the part of Great Britain that exemption of tolls on coastwise traffic—if so limited—was not an infringement of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Here was an admission of the fact that wise and patriotic men of this country, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, differ with the British contention and an offer to submit the matter to arbitration.

In the face of Mr. Innes's note, how can the President assert that—

The treaty outside of this country is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal?

The President is in further error, for there are jurists outside of the United States of standing and distinction who have debated this question.

In the London Law Magazine and Review Mr. Cox-Sinclair, an able and distinguished Englishman and student of international law, presented a paper wherein he reached the conclusion:

The United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and its case is difficult to challenge on the grounds of national justice.

Mr. C. A. Hereshoff-Bartlett, an equally well-known and learned international lawyer and an Englishman, recently said:

The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic or coastwise commerce and its use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit.

After speaking of the absurdity of the arguments advanced against the right of the United States as a sovereign power to discriminate in favor of its own vessels of commerce and war, he concluded:

The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessel" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

From Germany comes strong and able opinions supportive of the American contention.

Every United States Senator, living or dead, who participated in the approval of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and who has left an expression of his recollection says that it was commonly understood in the Senate that the treaty left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels.

I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the terms "all nations"— said Senator LODGE.

In presenting the treaty which he negotiated, and which in part bears his name, to the Senate for its consideration, Secretary Hay accompanied it by a memorandum:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of construction is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it.

President Taft in 1912 said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

In January, 1913, President Roosevelt said:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls.

In July, 1912, the Democratic national platform said:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

On August 15, 1912, President Wilson, then governor of New Jersey and candidate for President, said to an audience of farmers at Washington Park, N. J.:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending, passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House, provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The American position is further supported by the opinion of ex-Secretary of State Olney, and the weight of authority is clearly with the American people.

For one I take no particular pride, nor do I feel partisan satisfaction at the unenviable attitude now occupied by this administration; nor do I find joy, but, rather, do I sorrow in the inexplicable change which has occurred in the President's mind and that of the Secretary of State since election.

According to their then conception a party platform constituted a treaty between the people and the party, which honor required to be faithfully observed by candidates after election.

At Washington Park, N. J., Woodrow Wilson, candidate for President, said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along business lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

Before the Legislature of Pennsylvania Secretary Bryan spoke on the sacredness of platform pledges, in part, as follows:

The fact that we not only have platforms, but that the platform is becoming more specified year after year, is conclusive proof that the people believe in the Democratic theory, and they write their platforms because they believe, and those who run upon them lead the voters to believe, that they believe a platform is binding upon those who stand upon it.

As a believer in the Democratic theory of representative government, I desire to announce it as a settled principle, not to be questioned in this country, that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon this platform. I have heard it said by men after an election that they could not conscientiously support something in their platform, and it raises a very important question whether a man should violate his conscience as a public servant, and I frankly tell you that I believe that no man should violate his conscience, either as an individual or as a public servant. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should as an official do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.

I lay it down as a proposition, and I am prepared to defend it anywhere, that the representative who secures office upon a platform and then holds the office and betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than the man who embezzled money intrusted to him.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY—1901.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials, in the canal, except in the case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purpose of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

JOHN HAY [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

The contention which is advanced that the provisions in the Panama Canal act exempting American vessels engaged in coastwise trade are violative of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty rests upon several propositions; that the treaty covers coastwise vessels; that neutralization includes commerce; that the United States is one of the "all nations" in article 3.

As article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 is mentioned in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and is frequently referred to in argument, it may be considered in determining the meaning of the later treaty.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY (1850), ARTICLE 8.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

BRIEF HISTORY OF OUR ISTHMIAN TREATIES.

The discovery of gold in California, the acquisition of Alaska, the acceptance of Texas into the Union all contributed to spurring the desire of the American people for an interoceanic canal. Great Britain, with her possessions in India not then accessible by way of the Suez Canal, was likewise interested in a shorter sea route to her Asiatic possessions.

Great Britain had seized upon the Mosquito Coast one of the termini of the then proposed Nicaraguan Canal. This claim on the part of Great Britain, together with a lack of capital for such an enterprise, led this country to negotiate a treaty in 1850, now known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Under this treaty a joint protectorate was established over the canal and over such private corporation as it was expected would undertake its construction.

The United States, then financially unable, expected British capital would be forthcoming, but she looked in vain.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated a canal through Nicaragua, but because other routes were suggested—one through Mexico and the other through the Isthmus of Panama—article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was adopted, so as to make it apply to any other route which might be selected.

As the United States grew in greatness it became more and more apparent that no other nation could or would build the canal—and the American wishes were quite clearly crystallized, finding expressions in many utterances from the President down—that the canal when built must be an American one and controlled by the Federal authorities.

A treaty also called the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated in 1900, but failed of ratification. Except as it may have some argumentative significance, it need not be referred to.

In 1901 the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was adopted. It does not mention the location of the canal, but its terms are broad enough to include any canal connecting the two oceans.

Later the Government of the United States acquired title and sovereignty in the land and decided that it should be built by the Panama route.

A great deal has been said and written about the Hay-Pauncefote treaty opinions of great men sought and given, among them Hon. Joseph H. Choate, who was ambassador to Great Britain when the treaty was negotiated.

In his speech before the Chamber of Commerce of New York, February 13, 1913, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 24, 1914, he said that the Panama Canal exemption law—is believed by him and by us and by almost the unanimous voice of the American press, I think, to be in conflict with the treaty. Why, the merest schoolboy can pass upon the question.

I am going to read you the two clauses, and I would like to challenge any Member to show how they can possibly be reconciled:

"The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

That is what the treaty says. In the canal bill the clause covered by Mr. ROOT'S motion to strike out is this:

"No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Can you put those two things together and reconcile them in any possible way?

Unfortunately for his contention, he did not read the treaty aright, for it does not say that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of equality."

The treaty specifically gives the privilege to those nations "observing these rules." An important distinction.

The United States gets its right to use the canal for its vessels of commerce and war by virtue of its ownership and sovereignty, while "all nations" obtain their right to the use of the canal by "observance" of the rules which the United States "adopts."

Can it be successfully argued therefore that the owner of the canal who adopts the rules, the observance of which by nations entitles such nations to its use, is included in the word "nations"?

The flippant easily say "all nations" of course means all nations, and includes the United States. The context shows this not to be true.

In depicting the conquering power of the Prince of Peace the great Christian philosopher says of Him:

For He hath put all things under his feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him.

So when "the United States adopts * * * the rule the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules," it is manifest that the United States, which adopts the rule, is excepted from the "all nations" which are under the rule. It is clear that the rights of all nations to use the canal are by observance of rules, while the right of the United States, which prescribes the rule, is because of ownership. Clearly, then, the United States are not included in "all nations."

A reference to the treaty shows that if observance of the rules is a condition precedent to the right to the use of the canal by all nations, then all nations are subject to all the rules—Nos. 1 to 6—and if the United States is included in "all nations," it, too, becomes subject to these six rules. A reading of them shows how serious such a contention would be to this country were it ever engaged in war.

The illogical position taken by those who seek to avoid the force of this suggestion is that the United States is one of the "all nations" within the meaning of rule 1, but not an "all nation" within the meaning of rules 2 to 6.

In 1815 a treaty was entered into with Great Britain under the terms of which—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed on any of the United States or British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Not one word is mentioned concerning coastwise vessels. They are not in terms excluded from the treaty; yet Great Britain has always differentiated in favor of her coastwise vessels against vessels of this country on the ground that coastwise trade was matter of domestic economy and not within the scope or intendment of the treaty.

A case arose in the United States, decided by the Supreme Court, reported in One hundred and fifty-ninth United States, page 344, where foreign vessels were charged higher pilotage than our coastwise vessels, and it was adjudicated that this was not in violation of the treaty of 1815.

If "coastwise trade" was not within the treaty of 1815, it is hard to understand how "coastwise-trade" exemption from tolls is prohibited by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The parallel between the two treaties in this respect is complete.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty expressly supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but because it provides for a preservation of the "general principle" of neutralization contained in the older treaty it is sought to engraft its terms on the later one. If this were true, the new treaty were useless. Nor is there any more soundness of reasoning in the effort to stretch the word "neutralization," which gains its significance from conditions of belligerency and war, to include "commerce" in time of peace.

The American people demand that their rights shall not be surrendered at the call of fear. They were too dearly bought to be lightly treated. They have reached a place of dignity through great vicissitudes, and now, in the crowning days of great accomplishment, they demand the protection of a patriotic people at the hands of their representatives in government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I fear our Democratic friends have lost sight of another plank in the Democratic platform, which provides as follows:

> We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and in many cases prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessaries of life. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles of American manufacture which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.
> We recognize that our system of tariff taxation is intimately connected with the business of the country, and we favor the ultimate attainment of the principles we advocate by legislation that will not injure or destroy legitimate industry.

Business is greatly depressed throughout the country, much to the regret of every patriotic citizen.

Mr. Speaker, under the rule I will insert as a part of my remarks 10 reasons why the bill under consideration should be defeated.

TEN REASONS WHY CONGRESS SHOULD NOT YIELD OUR PANAMA CANAL RIGHTS AT ENGLAND'S DEMAND.

First. If Congress repeals the act granting American domestic commerce free use of the Panama Canal, the only power in the world hampered and shackled as to the use of the canal will be our own country, that alone built and owns the canal. Any foreign power may remit the tolls paid by its own ships. Spain has already decided to do so. Other nations may reimburse their shipowners for all Panama Canal charges as an encouragement to commerce. England and Germany pay enormous subsidies to their shipowners. But President Wilson declines "to have any controversy" with England over our right to give any privileges whatsoever to our own domestic commerce in our own canal.

Second. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty has no bearing on the controversy. The Anglo-American canal contemplated in that treaty was never built, for the simple reason that England never fulfilled her part of the understanding. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated the construction of an interoceanic canal jointly by the Governments of Great Britain and the United States. In a period of political timidity, with civil war threatening, our Government in 1850 hesitated to enter upon so great a project without Great Britain's cooperation. The United States had earlier, by treaty with the Central American States (Granada), procured permission to construct a canal, but England formally demanded to be made a party to the enterprise. Believing that England would supply part of the funds, the United States yielded. Having secured the treaty, England did nothing. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, 51 years later, superseded and abrogated the earlier treaty. The Panama Canal then became an exclusively American enterprise. The only reason for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was the repeal of the older one.

Third. Article 2 of the new treaty says that the United States shall enjoy all the rights of ownership, except as indicated in the treaty; shall enjoy exclusive control and power over the canal; and shall make all rules and establish the rates. This article is never quoted by the advocates of Great Britain's claims, but it is controlling. The next article, article 3, provides:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges shall be just and equitable.

In other words, the United States adopts the rules, and it guarantees equality, not with itself to all other nations, but equality of all the nations obeying its rules. The "discrimination" between the United States and other nations, i. e., the difference between the tenants and the landlord, is in the terms of the treaty itself.

Fourth. If the contention of Great Britain that it is not an American canal, but an Anglo-American canal, is true, then it must necessarily follow that the warships of the United States are upon exactly the same footing as the warships of Great Britain, because the treaty provides that "vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal"—the most extraordinary proposition, as Senator CUMMINS has well stated, if it applies to the United States, that has ever been advanced by a President. If it is true, the United States is at once reduced to the rank of mere gatekeeper and toll collector of the Panama Canal, and is not its rightful owner.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE has stated that if such an interpretation as Great Britain now makes—supported by President Wilson—had been expressed at the time, he would never, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, have reported the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the Senate, and it could never have been adopted. President Taft, a good lawyer, concurred in this view.

Fifth. The freedom of tolls granted to American ships applies only to domestic commerce. It does not apply to American ships in foreign commerce. As to the latter, Congress has put the ships of all nations, including our own, upon equality as to tolls. The act of Congress granting free tolls to our coast-to-coast shipping does not discriminate against foreign ships, because no foreign ships are permitted to engage in that trade. This has been true for nearly a century. No foreign ship can clear from any American port with a cargo for any other American port; that right is now reserved exclusively to American ships.

Sixth. Free tolls is a doctrine of the Democratic Party, because it was believed that it would make for cheap food and otherwise benefit consumers by cheapening the rates of transportation between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic seaboard. One of the primary objects in building the canal was to develop water competition with the transcontinental railroads. If a ship of 5,000 tons burden, bringing food from southern California to New York, is charged $6,000 tolls in going through the canal, that $6,000 will not only be added to the price of the food but a ratable addition will be made to the price of every ton of food transported by railroads across the continent, because the water rate will fix the land rate.

Seventh. Great Britain has never interpreted her own treaties regarding equality of rates and port charges as she now seeks to compel the United States to interpret the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The treaty of commerce between the United States and Great Britain, signed in 1815, provides that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels." Under it Great Britain has always held that the provision did not apply to her own domestic commerce or coastwise trade. She has favored many of her own vessels as to port charges as a class separate and distinct from vessels engaged in foreign trade.

Eighth. The United States has always held that "vessels of a nation," or even "vessels," as used in treaties, by long-continued custom and acquiescence are universally accepted as not embracing vessels engaged in the coasting trade. Thus the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Denmark, of 1826, provided "nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one party upon vessels of the other than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels." This is a very much stronger equality clause than that in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because "native vessels" are distinctly included in the provision. Nevertheless, the United States, under this treaty, has always excepted its coastwise vessels.

Ninth. The provisions of the treaty of 1815 have already been judicially interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, which can not be suspected of indifference to legal obligations, as recently as 1904. In the opinion written by Justice White, now Chief Justice of the United States, in Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344), it is held that—

> Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting under the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels.

Tenth. Even as late as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in 1901, it was expected that an interoceanic canal would be built by private enterprise under the protection of the United States Government. A Wall Street syndicate, headed by Morgan, with Frederick Cromwell as counsel, was then organizing to do this work as a private enterprise. But private enterprise proved unequal to it.

It was too big. The United States Government took up the task. Instead of being a mere guardian of neutrality, the United States became itself the sole owner and sovereign of the soil over which this great waterway is built. The cost, more than $400,000,000, was not subscribed in any part in Europe. It was furnished by the United States alone, not private funds, but public funds derived by public taxation for public purposes.

By treaty and purchase the United States acquired the land, and the 10-mile-wide strip of territory across the Isthmus of Panama is to-day as much United States territory as Broadway, New York. It is a little late for Great Britain, even with the consent of an American President, to try to make the Panama Canal an Anglo-American canal.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I yield, Mr. Speaker, to my colleague from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, on March 17, during the general debate on the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, I addressed the House at some length in opposition to the repeal of that clause of the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels of the United States in the coastwise trade passing through the canal from the payment of tolls.

Ordinarily I would not dare to enlarge upon the views I expressed at that time; but certain statements and charges have been made repeatedly during the pending debate by those who favor the repeal, which statements and charges ought not to go unchallenged.

It has been asserted over and over again by some gentlemen that "the interests" and the "ship trust" demanded the enactment of the tolls-exemption clause. Of course it is quite popular nowadays to denounce "the trusts" and "the interests." But those who have indulged in these denunciations have failed to state that the canal act itself specifically prohibits trust-owned and railroad-owned ships from passing through the canal at all. It is probable that gentlemen who resort to tactics of that kind hope to divert attention from their own conduct in favoring what the distinguished leader of the Democratic majority in this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD] so aptly denominated "an un-American surrender" of our country's rights and interests.

Now, if there be any special "interests" that are vitally concerned in the outcome of this canal legislation, they are the great transcontinental railroad corporations of the North American Continent. They want the pending Sims bill passed. They are against tolls exemption for American vessels in the coastwise trade. For a generation or longer they were instrumental in preventing the enactment of any legislation in favor of an isthmian canal. Time and again, always urging some plausible excuse, they succeeded in defeating every effort to secure the necessary legislation for the inauguration of the work. But eventually, after the passage of the U. S. battleship Oregon from San Francisco around Cape Horn to the blockading fleet at Santiago de Cuba, our countrymen became aroused to the necessity of the construction of an isthmian canal as a matter of national defense.

Does anyone here doubt it was the Canadian Pacific Railroad that inspired England's protest against free tolls? Does anyone here doubt the Canadian Pacific's activities were inspired by the great transcontinental systems of our own country, which had been worsted in their endeavors to prevent the enactment of those provisions of the Panama Canal act prohibiting railroad-owned ships and trust-owned ships from passing through the canal at all? And how about the Tehuantepec National Railroad of Mexico? It is owned jointly by the Mexican Government and an English syndicate operating through Messrs. S. Pearson & Son (Ltd.), of London. The working capital is $7,000,000. If American ships in the coastwise trade were permitted to pass through the canal free of tolls, the Tehuantepec National Railroad would undoubtedly become an unprofitable piece of property. Does anyone doubt this English syndicate and Mexican owned railroad helped to inspire England's protest?

Lord Cowdray, whose family name is Pearson, is president of this railroad corporation. Of the 900,000 tons of freight which it handles, 750,000 tons come from American coastwise trade, between points on the Atlantic coast and points on the Pacific coast and the Hawaiian Islands. The most of this traffic is handled by the Hawaiian-American Steamship Co., of 8 Bridge Street, New York, an American company independent of railroad connections. This company now owns 26 steamships, and in December, 1913, issued a map on the face of which is the statement, "Route changed to Panama Canal when opened." As I have stated, the capital for the construction of the Tehuantepec National Railroad of Mexico was furnished by an English syndicate, of which Lord Cowdray is the head. I have heard that Lord Cowdray is related by marriage to Earl Grey's family, and, of course, Earl Grey is the English foreign secretary who has protested against the free-tolls clause of the Panama Canal act.

Lord Cowdray and his associates have a contract with the Mexican Government whereby they are to operate the Tehuantepec Railroad for 51 years.

The opening of the Panama Canal with no tolls, duties, charges, or restrictions to American coastwise traffic means the utter ruin of Lord Cowdray's great property. It means the transference of at least 750,000 tons of freight from the Tehuantepec Railroad to the Panama Canal.

At the present time every pound of sugar from the Hawaiian Islands and vast quantities of other freight are carried to the Tehuantepec Railroad by ships, transshipped across the Isthmus, and continued to its destination on the ships of the American-Hawaiian Co. and other lines.

So when Members of this House glibly talk about "the interests" that are concerned in this legislation they had better bear in mind these great railroad corporations that are vitally interested in seeing the President's policy enacted into law by the passage of the Sims bill.

Mr. Speaker, there are many Members who honestly believe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not give us the right to exempt any of our vessels from the payment of tolls. I do not question their good faith. I do not question their sincerity. We who hold the opposite views are equally sincere and equally earnest in our contentions. For myself I do not hesitate in saying that if there were a doubt in my mind as to which of the two constructions is the proper one to be placed upon a treaty concerning the construction of which there is a controversy between some foreign nation and my own country, I would resolve the doubt in favor of my own country every time. I would follow the rule of construction adopted by the courts in construing the statutes enacted by the legislatures of this country. They resolve the doubt in favor of constitutionality as against unconstitutionality in deciding questions of doubt as to the constitutionality of statutes.

But in their zeal to do the President's bidding some of those who have spoken in favor of the pending bill have told us that we have become an outlaw nation on account of our proneness to break international promises or agreements. "Outlaw" is a harsh term to apply to our country. Who has applied it? Is it England? Is it Japan? These are the countries with which we have exchanged most of the diplomatic notes that have challenged the attention of the State Department during the incumbency of the present administration, if the newspaper accounts are to be relied on.

Mr. Speaker, how do American promises compare with those of these two countries? When we assumed our share of the white man's burden we promised the world that after we had made Cuba free we would retire from that island. We kept the faith. We redeemed our promises. Although the great nations of the earth doubtlessly believed that we would never give Cuba her independence or retire from her shores, we kept the faith in spirit and letter.

England invaded Egypt, ostensibly to suppress an insurrection against Tewfik Pasha, the Khedive of that country. England likewise promised the world to retire after she had restored order in that seat of ancient civilization. That was in 1882, about 32 years ago. How has England kept the faith? She is still there. She has no thought of retiring; she has no idea of keeping her promise to the world in that matter. It does not lie in the mouth of her statesmen or her people to proclaim us outlaws or promise breakers.

Take the case of Japan and Korea. Japan, after her war with Russia, made similar guaranties to the world regarding her attitude toward the Hermit Kingdom. How has Japan kept the faith? She has manifested no intention of retiring from Korea; in fact, she has actually annexed it to her own territory. Surely Japan can not accuse us of violating promises. So that I do not believe it comes with good grace for either England or Japan to accuse us of being promise breakers.

Mr. Speaker, my good friend the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], in his speech the other day, referred rather facetiously to President George Washington and some of the patriots of the earlier years of our national life. It is a pity he overlooked or forgot some important historical facts that occurred in the closing years of the life of the Father of his Country. The latter was confronted with serious problems in the early days of the Republic. Did he pusillanimously submit to the demands of France when the latter undertook to interfere in our domestic affairs? Mark what Washington did. France had been our friend, our ally, during the revolution. She had loaned us money. She had sent us troops. She had sent us fleets of warships. She had helped us materially to achieve our independence. Our ship of state had scarcely been launched when she sent Citizen Genet as her minister to the newly established Republic. Citizen Genet had scarcely arrived on our soil ere he undertook to interfere in our domestic affairs. Notwithstanding he had stanch friends among our early statesmen, he was promptly given his passports by President Washington. France, however, continued her aggressive and annoying policy of interference in American problems. Washington had gone into retirement at Mount Vervon after his withdrawal from public office. Finally the aggressions of our former friend and ally became so unbearable the sturdy veteran came forth from his retirement and, at the behest of President Adams and the Congress, again took command of the American forces, prepared to fight and, if need be, die rather than yield to the interference of France in our domestic or foreign affairs. That was the spirit of the founders of the Republic. Would to God that spirit might inspire those in high station in the present emergency to take a similar stand against foreign interference in what is purely a matter of the regulation of our own domestic affairs.

Mr. Speaker, as was well suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], if there be any dishonor in the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that dishonor rests upon England for trying to drive a hard bargain with the present administration for her so-called friendship. We have spent $375,000,000 to construct the canal. England has not spent a cent for its construction. Realizing the magnitude of the work and the effect it will have upon the trade routes of the world, Congress passed a resolution, approved February 15, 1911, authorizing the President of the United States to invite the nations of the world to participate at a universal exposition to be held at San Francisco in commemoration of the completion and dedication of this greatest of engineering feats in the world's history.

In accordance with that resolution of Congress, England, with the other civilized nations, was invited to participate. She has even refused to appropriate a single cent for such participation, and has positively declined the invitation of this Government to be represented at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. Of course, she had an undoubted right to do that if she so desired. But it seems to me that her demand for the repeal of the provision of the Panama Canal act which exempts our own vessels in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls comes with bad grace from a country that will reap the greatest benefits from the construction of that great waterway, notwithstanding the fact that that country has not spent one solitary cent to build it or to join us in the celebration of its completion.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt what the verdict of the American people will be if this pusillanimous surrender of our rights is carried into effect. The sturdy leaders of the Democratic majority of this House who have refused to violate their platform pledges at the behest of the Chief Executive will win the hearty approval of their countrymen when this question shall have been fully presented to the American people. All honor to the Speaker of this House [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], and their colleagues on the Democratic side who have refused to become parties to an un-American surrender of our rights and interests in the canal.

> Our Speaker's fame no base surrender dims;
> Nobler to fall with CLARK than mount with SIMS.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VARE] is recognized.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] said a few moments ago that he did not believe intelligent people of Irish extraction would be deceived by these arguments, namely, "that England was attempting to dictate the policy of our country." I regret that the gentleman did not have the opportunity of being at the Hotel Walton meeting at Philadelphia last Thursday night, and I regret that he did not have the opportunity of being at the meeting held in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia last night. If he had been there he would think differently. I regret another thing, and that is that each Member of this House does not live as close to the city of Washington as I do. Then he would have an opportunity of knowing what was in the minds of his constituents and what was in the minds of the American people. If to-day every Member of this House knew what was in the minds of his constituents and in the minds of the American people, I believe the demand for the passage of this bill would be withdrawn. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to vote against the repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act, and my reasons for doing so are economic and not political. The President has said that Congress should reverse its previous action in favor of exempting our coastwise vessels from tolls, regardless of whether we are right or wrong; that this is a question of national honor.

I agree that there is a question of national honor involved. This is one of the questions which I wish to discuss, and I will consume but a moment. Is it honorable for Congress one year to pass a law which serves as notice to American shipowners to invest their money in more ships and employ hundreds more workingmen only to revoke that action, destroying the prospect of a merchant marine and throwing many men out of work the next year?

Under the exemption clause a great many shipyards in this country felt that they could build more ships and gave employment to more men. Now they are being told that Congress must change this American law at the behest of Great Britain, actuated, according to common report, by the Canadian railroads.

In the national campaign of 1912 the Democratic Party charged that the protective tariff was responsible for the high cost of living. The protective part of the tariff was removed by the Democratic Party, but the cost of living is still going up. This exemption clause in the Panama Canal act might have tended in a considerable degree to reduce the cost of living.

Not being compelled to pay tolls, the American coastwise ships would have been able to carry freight from Philadelphia and New York to San Francisco at a cheaper rate.

Railroad-owned ships, including those owned by the railroads of Canada, would have been excluded from the canal, thus assuring real competition. The public would have received the benefit of lower rates. California would have received the benefit of lower prices on eastern products, and Philadelphia would have received the benefit of lower prices on the fruits of California.

The exemption clause promised a shipbuilding boom which would have given employment to many hundreds of men throughout the United States. There would have been cheaper food, more employment, cheaper transportation, and greater competition between the railroads and the American coastwise ships.

We have come to the point where anything that we may do for American shipping is sharply resented by European powers. Europe objected to the 5 per cent discount on goods shipped in American bottoms, as provided by the tariff bill. As a result, the Attorney General of the United States declared this clause invalid. Congress then provided for the exemption of coastwise ships, and again we are told by Europe that we must repeal this clause.

On July 4, 1789, the American Congress passed a law establishing a differential duty of 10 per cent in favor of goods shipped in American bottoms, and the result was an American merchant marine that was the pride of the United States. We became so confident of our commercial strength on the seas, however, that we abolished the differential and soon afterwards American shipping began to decline.

We have been beaten in the diplomatic game. We have shown our power in many instances, but we have permitted foreign nations to draw us into agreements which prevented us from giving any advantage to our own ships. With reference to the rebate clause of the tariff bill, the Democratic chairman of the Finance Committee has said that if it were in conflict with the obsolete trade agreements with foreign nations, which have been disregarded by foreign nations who were parties to them, the agreements should be abrogated.

Now, we are told that this latest effort to break up the European monopoly of the American shipping business is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Is Europe never to let us build up American shipping? England subsidizes her own vessels, but says that we shall favor our own in no way lest she lose some of the business.

I have pointed out the great benefits conferred upon the people by the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act. It would afford them some relief from the high cost of living. It is suggested now that we give up these benefits at the behest of Great Britain. And for what reason? Because the President says that he "shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" if we do not yield to Great Britain.

Americans have never been known to be cowardly. We have never been known to retreat in the face of a threat. Two Presidents of the United States have said that our position is sound. Mr. Roosevelt says that the contention of Great Britain is unwise. Mr. Taft has said that we own the canal—that the money of the American taxpayers built it; that the exemption clause can not be held to be a discrimination. President Wilson in the campaign that resulted in his election said that we had a right to exempt our own coastwise ships. The Democratic platform declared for that principle.

Is it honorable, then, to reverse our principles simply because of certain vague threats regarding matters of "greater delicacy and nearer consequence"?

Exemption of coastwise ships was a patriotic issue of the Democratic campaign, made so by the party platform and reaffirmed by Mr. Wilson's speeches. By pledging the party to this policy many persons may have been induced to vote for the Democratic ticket—persons who might not have voted for the Democratic party if it had declared itself in favor of yielding to Great Britain.

If the Democratic Party had declared itself in favor of yielding to Great Britain on this question, I venture to say that it would have been made one of the leading issues in the campaign. The Republican Party felt that the issue had been decided; that Congress had given its word to the country that American coastwise ships would be exempted.

If Congress reverses itself now, the people will have reason to say that they were deceived; that a great issue was removed from the national campaign by deceit; that the Democratic Party has been disloyal to the people's trust in its effort to serve Great Britain.

I hold the people of my own country above the interest of Great Britain or the united powers of Europe. I came to Congress to serve the people who elected me and not the Government of Great Britain. I believe that all the people in the city which I represent—all the people who were born there and those who have come to our shores believing they would find the protection and assistance of a great Government—are entitled to the benefits of the exemption clause regardless of what pressure may be brought to bear on us by Europe. We owe a greater duty to our own people than to Europe. I believe that our attitude is right, and the suggestion that we yield to Great Britain, regardless of whether we are right or wrong, is not in the spirit in which this great Republic was founded. We did not yield on the "right-or-wrong" policy when England sought to tax us unjustly when we were her Colonies; and we should not yield now. [Applause.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in the last 20 years the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has presented for the consideration of this House more important legislative questions than any other committee, and I regard it as the most important committee in the House. For the first time in its eventful history, in asking for consideration of one of its bills, that committee has applied for a rule limiting debate and cutting off the right of amendment. [Applause.] In my service in the House, I believe, I have had charge of more important legislative bills than any other Member of either branch of Congress, and during that service I never once asked for or received a rule limiting debate and amendment on a bill under my care. [Applause.] And I know very well that my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of this great committee, for whom I have great respect and an affectionate regard, has not himself, of his own motion, cast a reflection upon the past history of his committee by asking for the gag rule under which we are now operating. [Applause.]

QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

Mr. Speaker, involved in the question before us, in my judgment, are three distinct propositions: First, our treaty rights; second, our moral duty; and, third, our economic policy. I shall not take the time to discuss the economic policy involved, because the policy of to-day may be changed to-morrow. We may have one economic policy now, and in the light of experience we may have another the next year. I shall not discuss at length our moral duty, because what is our moral duty at this hour may be changed in the next hour. But to me the question involved here of utmost importance is that of our treaty rights; because when those are finally settled they are settled for all time. If we to-day give away a right which belongs to us, and which we ought to transmit to our children and our children's children, that right may be gone forever. It can not be regained without great difficulty. [Applause.] And in approaching the subject of our treaty rights permit me to say that it is the policy of Congress, whenever it can do so honorably, to follow the lead of the President in our foreign relations. We on our side of the House have not endeavored to annoy or criticize the President's Mexican policy or his Japanese policy. We have stood behind him so far in these matters, because, in the main, Congress ought without regard to partisan divisions, as far as possible, to present a solid front to foreign nations.

Two years ago we passed the Panama Canal act and gave out our construction of our foreign policy, which to-day we are asked to reverse. I can not bring myself to the point of believing that our duty to the President in regard to our foreign policy requires us to vote to-day to reverse the foreign policy announced less than two years ago. [Applause.]

THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made in 1850. At that time the United States and Great Britain were striving for mastery of the Pacific Ocean. We had just made a treaty with Great Britain under which we had extended our western boundary line to the Pacific Ocean on the forty-ninth parallel, so that we had acquired undisputed title to the Oregon territory. We had just made a treaty with Mexico, under which we had acquired the California coast. We had just taken in Texas, under which we had extended our territory to the southwest. Great Britain was then in possession of the Atlantic end of the proposed Nicaragua Canal. In 1849 gold had been discovered in California. Our people were seeking the shores of the Pacific on the California coast. Everyone in our country was desirous of having a canal constructed so as to bring the East and the West together before the transcontinental railroads were really thought of. We could not construct the Nicaragua Canal ourselves, because Great Britain had one end of it. She was striving for mastery in the Pacific. We were striving for mastery in the Pacific. We had a concession from Nicaragua for the construction of the canal. Under that concession we had the right to construct the canal if we could settle with Great Britain. We made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, under which we agreed that neither Great Britain nor the United States would, as a government, construct the canal, and under which we agreed that the citizens and subjects of both nations, if a canal were constructed by a company or a corporation, should have equal rights in the canal. At that time it was expected that the people who had a concession from Nicaragua would be able to raise the money in England for the construction of the canal, but that hope faded away.

OUR PACIFIC POSSESSIONS.

Shortly after that we commenced to extend our Pacific possessions. We became the owner of Alaska. We have since become the owner of Hawaii, of the island of Guam, of the island of Pago Pago in the Tutuila Islands, of the Midway Islands, and of the Philippine Islands. Controlling as we do every strategic point in the North Pacific Ocean, every principal line of transit across that ocean, with our Alaska coast almost reaching to Asia, with the Hawaiian Islands in the center, with the Philippine Islands on the other side, we are the masters of the Pacific Ocean for all the future, if we keep our judgment and maintain our rights in the Panama Canal. [Applause.]

THE AMERICAN POSITION ON THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

In a letter from Secretary of State Frelinghuysen to the American ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Lowell, dated May 8, 1882, it was said:

The President believes that the formation of a protectorate by European nations over the isthmus transit would be in conflict with a doctrine which has been for many years asserted by the United States. This sentiment is properly termed a doctrine, as it has no prescribed sanction and its assertion is left to the exigency which may invoke it. It has been repeatedly announced by the Executive Department of this Government and through the utterances of distinguished citizens; it is cherished by the American people and has been approved by the Government of Great Britain.

* * * * * *

When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded it was contemplated that the Nicaragua Canal, to which the treaty principally had relation, would be at once commenced and finished with all possible speed by American and British capital under the impulse of the joint protectorate. This appears not only from the context of the treaty, but also from the history of negotiations which lead to the treaty, and the relations which then existed between this Government and the Central American States.

* * * * * * *

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded to secure a thing which did not exist and which now never can exist. It was to secure the construction of a canal under the grant of 1849 from Nicaragua that the United States consented to waive the exclusive and valuable rights which have been given to them; that they consented to agree with Great Britain that they would not occupy, fortify, colonize, or assume dominion over any part of Central America, and that they consented to admit Her Majesty's Government at some future day to a share in the protection which they have exercised over the Isthmus of Panama.

The Government and people of the United States, though rich in land and industry, were poor in money and floating capital in 1850. The scheme for a canal, even without the complication of the Mosquito protectorate, was too vast for the means of the Americans of that day who numbered then considerably less than one-half of their numbers to-day. They went to England, which had what they had not, surrendered their exclusive privileges, offered an equal share of all they had in those regions in order, as expressed in the seventh article of the treaty, "that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal." Through no fault of theirs time was unnecessarily lost, the work was never begun, and the concession failed.

In his report in 1900 on his bill Mr. Hepburn said:

The last 50 years has wrought a remarkable change in our relations to a waterway crossing the Isthmus—1850 was only four years removed from our first occupation of California. It was only four years later than the passage of the first party of emigrants from the Mississippi River under the protection of a military force to Oregon. It was but two years after the cession of large landed interests on the Pacific coast from Mexico. It was only three years after settlement of the disputed boundary of our northwest Pacific possessions.

In submitting views of the minority on the Hepburn bill, reported to the House in 1900, providing that the United States should construct an isthmian canal, Mr. SHACKLEFORD said:

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as is so clearly shown by Mr. Hepburn, long ago ceased to have any binding force, by reason of the conduct of Great Britain. That being true, we should strictly adhere to the Monroe doctrine and stand by our traditional policy that Europe will not be permitted to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. It is to the Monroe doctrine that we as a Republic must look for safety. We should never, under any circumstances, even tacitly admit that Europe has the right to so much as interrogate us on American questions, much less to limit our action.

When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made, England being desirous of maintaining more or less supremacy in the Pacific Ocean and anxious to reach Australia and her Indian possessions by the shortest route, wanted equal treatment. But since that time the world has constructed the Suez Canal. England has reached her Indian possessions through that canal. The map of the world was changed between the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED CANAL.

The time came when it was conceded everywhere that this tremendous enterprise was too great for any private company or private corporation to undertake. It was determined in this House and elsewhere that the Government of the United States, with its willingness to aid the world and with its vast possessions and power and great treasure, was the only means by which the canal could be constructed. After this House had passed a bill providing that the Government should construct the canal, notwithstanding the then Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we approached England with a proposition for a new treaty, under which our country might build the canal. Could Great Britain refuse us? Could England decline to permit this Government, on its own terms, to construct what the world for 400 years had been hoping might be constructed? Could Great Britain say, "That which we want, that which is in the interest of our shipping, that which the world desires, that which you are willing to give out of the fullness of your heart and your treasure, we will not permit because of an antiquated, outgrown treaty of more than 50 years ago"? [Applause.] She could not, she did not dare refuse, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated. I have not the time to discuss the history of the negotiations, which, in my judgment, clearly shows that the United States is not to be treated on the same terms as foreign nations in the control of the canal. [Applause.]

But I have noticed in this debate and elsewhere that many gentlemen say, "Never mind what the negotiations were, here is the plain language of the treaty."

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

And Mr. Choate, who admits modestly that he is the author of the whole thing, quotes the treaty incorrectly, either knowing better or showing his ignorance. [Laughter and applause.] What is the treaty?

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, signed November 18, 1901, ratified by the Senate December 16, 1901, and proclaimed February 22, 1902, is as follows:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say—

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal, except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

In the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty occurs the following:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

Articles 1 and 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty then provides that the United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules:

First, the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

WHAT ARE THE RULES TO BE OBSERVED?

Now, what are these rules? Remember, the language of the treaty is the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation. What are these rules?

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. That is one of them.

Another is that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal, except so far as be strictly necessary, and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Another rule is: No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike material in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

Another rule is: The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

Do you tell me that these rules, the observance of which is required by all nations in order to give equality in the canal—that these rules which would prevent our maintaining our war vessels in the canal in time of war, or revictualing our vessels in time of war in the canal, or disembarking troops or munitions of war, apply to the United States or the Republic of Panama, upon whose zone the canal is constructed? [Applause.]

THE PRESENT TOLL LAW.

What, then, is the issue before us? A little less than two years ago we passed a Panama Canal act, and in that act we provided that no tolls should be levied upon our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. We further provided that the President, in fixing the tolls, might give preference to American vessels in the foreign trade, though he did not do that in fixing the rate of tolls.

We further provided that the vessels belonging to the Republic of Panama should not pay tolls. We made three exceptions in regard to tolls. Having provided the tolls for all other vessels in the world except the United States flag vessels and Panama vessels, we made the exemption first of coastwise trade directly, authorized the President to give preferential rates on our vessels in the foreign trade, and made the exemption of Panama vessels entirely.

Section 5 of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, contains the following provisions:

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe, and from time to time change, the tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal: Provided, That no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed unless six months' notice thereof shall have been given by the President by proclamation. No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. * * *

Tolls may be based upon gross or net registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, or otherwise, and may be based on one form of tonnage for warships and another for ships of commerce. The rate of tolls may be lower upon vessels in ballast than upon vessels carrying passengers or cargo. When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903. * * *

THE ENGLISH CONTENTION.

Thereupon Sir Edward Grey, in behalf of the English Government, made his protest against that law, before he knew the rates of tolls prescribed, and upon what did he protest? He protested against three things:

First, that no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Second, that tolls when based upon registered tonnage for ships of commerce are not to be less than a certain amount, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, which is the provision which gave the right of preferential tolls to our vessels in the foreign trade.

Third, there is also an exception to the exemption granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

Sir Edward Grey was logical, whatever the gentlemen may be who are advocating the present bill. He knew that if the words "all nations observing these rules" meant the United States, which constructed the canal, and Panama, which gave the right of construction, then we could no more exempt the vessels of Panama than we could our own vessels in the canal, because Panama, through whose country the canal runs, could have no greater rights of free transit than we who built the canal and owned it. [Applause.]

In the letter from Sir Edward Grey, representing the British Government, dated November 14, 1912, and handed to the Secretary of State by the British ambassador December 9, 1912, it is stated:

It remains to consider whether the Panama Canal act in its present form conflicts with the treaty rights to which His Majesty's Government maintain they are entitled.

Under section 5 of the act the President is given, within certain defined limits, the right to fix the tolls, but no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, and the tolls, when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce, are not to exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. There is also an exception for the exemptions granted by article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

The effect of these provisions is that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Similarly vessels belonging to the Government of the Republic of Panama will, in pursuance of the treaty of 1903, contribute nothing to the upkeep of the canal. Again, in the cases where tolls are levied, the tolls in the case of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens may be fixed at a lower rate than in the case of foreign ships, and may be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

These provisions (1) clearly conflict with the rule embodied in the principle established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of equal treatment for British and United States ships, and (2) would enable tolls to be fixed which would not be just and equitable, and would therefore not comply with rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, referred to in Sir Edward Grey's letter, is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

THE AMERICAN PRINCIPLE.

In the reply made by Secretary of State Knox he states clearly the principle for which I am speaking.

In the letter from Secretary of State Knox, replying to Sir Edward Grey's letter, dated January 17, 1913, it is said:

It may be stated at the outset that this Government does not agree with the interpretation placed by Sir Edward Grey upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but for reasons which will appear hereinbelow it is not deemed necessary at present to amplify or reiterate the views of this Government upon the meaning of those treaties.

* * * * * * *

From this it appears that three objections are made to the provisions of the act: First, that no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States; second, that a discretion appears to be given to the President to discriminate in fixing tolls in favor of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens as against foreign ships; and, third, that an exemption has been given to the vessels of the Republic of Panama under article 19 of the convention with Panama of 1903.

* * * * * * *

The United States has always asserted the principle that the status of the countries immediately concerned by reason of their political relation to the territory in which the canal was to be constructed was different from that of all other countries.

THE CLEARLY DEFINED ISSUE.

Here is a clearly defined issue: Great Britain says that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we can make no exception of any vessel passing through the canal, though it may be owned by the United States or its citizens, or by Panama or its citizens, and our country maintains that the status of the country which gave the right to build the canal and of the country which built the canal was different under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from any other country of the world. [Applause.]

IMMEDIATE CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY BY THE HOUSE.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed in November, 1901. It was ratified by the Senate of the United States on December 16, 1901, at the first session of the fifty-seventh Congress. It was not proclaimed until February, 1902, but three days after it was ratified by the Senate the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, who first proposed officially that the Government of the United States should solve the problem by building the canal, and whose face I am glad to see before me to-day, the great man of the canal, William Peter Hepburn [applause], reported to this House a bill for the construction of a Nicaraguan canal. It is somewhat strange to now hear gentlemen who then voted upon that bill discuss the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That bill contained a provision in direct conflict with the claims on the part of England of the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The bill was reported to this House three days after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been ratified by the Senate, and it passed this House on January 9, 1902, before the treaty had been fully proclaimed, but after it had been ratified, by a record vote of 308 yeas and 2 nays. [Applause.] And among the distinguished gentlemen who had the honor to vote for that bill, which they now say is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, were my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. [Applause.]

IMMEDIATE CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY BY THE SENATE.

That bill went to the Senate of the United States, which had just ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We have heard a great deal here about what this Senator says and that Senator says as to the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty when pending before the Senate. But when the Hepburn bill was pending before the Senate the subject was fresh in their minds. If ever they knew what they meant in the Senate, they knew it then when they were passing upon a bill based on a treaty which they had just ratified. And what did they put in this bill? The Senate struck out all after the enacting clause of the Hepburn bill and inserted what is now the law, called the Spooner Act. What is section 6 of that act? That is the act under which the Panama Canal has been constructed. It is the act under which we acquired our right to build it, because we directed the President to make the treaty which was made with Panama or with the Republic of Colombia. Let me read to you what section 6 of the act of June 28, 1902, says:

SEC. 6. That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

Here was a construction of the treaty by the same Senate which had ratified it within a few days after it was ratified, authorizing and directing the President to grant to the country from which we obtained the right to build the canal preferential tolls or no tolls at all. [Applause.] What was done under that?

HAY'S CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY.

A gentleman the other day, with fair words but little knowledge, said, "Oh, what would John Hay have said to this construction of the treaty—that great statesman and diplomat? He would not have so violated the honor of his country." Mr. Speaker, after the passage of the Spooner Act Secretary of State Hay negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Colombia, which treaty was ratified by the Senate of the United States. It was signed by Mr. Hay on January 22, 1903, and was ratified by the Senate of the United States, but was not ratified by the Republic of Colombia. What did that treaty provide? Article 16 of this treaty—the Hay-Herran treaty—negotiated by Mr. Hay provided:

The canal when constructed and the entrance thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The very next article of this treaty immediately following this declaration that the canal should be open in conformity with section 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—the next article, written by John Hay—provided:

The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind.

[Applause.]

Here was a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by John Hay which Sir Edward Grey now says is in violation of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I prefer now to take this judgment of John Hay, who signed the treaty, and of the Senate of the United States, which ratified the treaty, rather than the belated opinion of Sir Edward Grey, or even the opinion of President Wilson. [Applause.]

AS CONSTRUED BY OUR TREATY WITH PANAMA.

What more? The treaty with Colombia was rejected by Colombia, and Secretary Hay negotiated a treaty with Panama, which had become a Republic. Again, article 18 of the treaty with Panama which is now in force provides:

That the canal shall be subject to all the conditions provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

And the next section of the Panama treaty, article 19, provides:

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times, without paying charges of any kind.

Articles 18 and 19 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, signed November 18, 1903, by John Hay on the part of the United States and proclaimed February 26, 1904, in full are as follows:

ARTICLE 18.

The canal when constructed and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

ARTICLE 19.

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war, and supplies.

That was the treaty under which we secured the right to build the canal.

MR. ROOT'S CONSTRUCTION IN 1909.

A similar provision was inserted in another treaty which never was ratified, signed in 1909, by a distinguished Senator of the United States, who ever since that time has been endeavoring to repudiate his official action at that time. Secretary of State ELIHU ROOT negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Colombia in which it was provided that that Republic should have the liberty at all times to convey through the ship canal now in course of construction, and so forth, troops, materials of war, and ships of war without paying any duty to the United States.

The following is a portion of article 2 of the draft of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Colombia, signed by ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of State, on behalf of the United States, January 9, 1909, ratified by the Senate of the United States February 24, 1909, but which was not ratified by the Colombian Congress:

ARTICLE 2.

In consideration of the provisions and stipulations hereinafter contained, it is agreed as follows:

The Republic of Colombia shall have liberty at all times to convey through the ship canal now in course of construction by the United States across the Isthmus of Panama the troops, materials for war, and ships of war of the Republic of Colombia without paying any duty to the United States, even in the case of an international war between Colombia and another country.

This treaty which Mr. ROOT negotiated with Colombia in 1909 was one of three treaties signed at the same time. In addition to the treaty between the United States and Colombia there was a treaty between the United States and Panama and also a treaty between Panama and Colombia. These treaties were intended as a settlement of the controversy between the United States and Panama and Colombia growing out of the Panama revolution against Colombia, the recognition of Panama by the United States, and the acquirement of the right from Panama for the United States to build a canal. They assumed that the Republic of Colombia had some rights in the canal by reason of its former ownership of the territory through which the canal has been constructed, which placed Colombia on a different footing from any nation other than Panama and the United States; and the treaties were signed for the purpose of settling all questions growing out of the fact that the United States had acquired from the new Republic of Panama the right to build the canal through the territory which had belonged to Colombia before the Panaman revolution.

OBTAINING ENGLAND'S CONSENT.

Mr. ROOT stated on February 12, 1913, before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals that he negotiated the treaty with Colombia after obtaining the consent of Great Britain. He said:

These treaties were to clear the title to the Isthmus from the claim that Colombia still makes, and they provided for the same privileges to Colombia which had been contained in the Hay-Herran treaty and which were contained in the Panama treaty. Under it Colombia gave up her claim of title and cleared our title. I got the consent of Great Britain to that specifically.

While Colombia rejected this treaty with her, so that it never went into effect, the provision I refer to involved a construction of the right of the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to grant special favors to Colombia in regard to her vessels going through the canal.

Mr. ROOT says that he specifically obtained the consent of Great Britain to that provision in the treaty. I should like to know how the consent was asked for and how it was expressed. It seems more than passing strange that if the English Government consented to this treaty in 1909, Sir Edward Grey, in 1912, would take express exception to the provision in our treaty with Panama granting Panama free tolls on certain of her vessels and materials. Upon what theory could Great Britain, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, consent to our allowing vessels of Colombia to go through the canal free and object to the allowance we had made that vessels of Panama should go through free? And if Great Britain had consented in 1909 that Colombian vessels should go through free, how does it happen that she protested in 1912 against vessels of Panama going through free, without any reference to her former consent? And how does it happen that no one else in this country, and apparently no one at all in Great Britain, knew that our Secretary of State had asked and obtained the consent in 1909 for Colombian vessels to be exempt from tolls? If there are any papers in the State Department showing that this consent was asked for or received, they ought to be made public.

ROOT'S HUMILIATING STATEMENT.

The statement of Mr. ROOT about having obtained the specific consent of Great Britain is a statement filled with humiliation for the United States. Suppose Great Britain had refused her consent at that time? Here we were negotiating treaties for the purpose of settling a controversy which involved our right to construct the canal at all at Panama, and, according to Mr. ROOT, if Great Britain had refused to give her consent we would have been in the humiliating position of being unable to settle that controversy with Colombia. The very statement of the case shows the danger of admitting England's present construction of the treaty. Will we have to ask in the future the consent of Great Britain every time we want to deal with the canal question and settle controversies in regard to it and our rights in it and our right to construct it? The humiliating confession of Mr. ROOT would seem to indicate that such would be the case, but I deny that such a construction is a correct one.

We are pledged to Great Britain to grant to no other country not immediately connected with the construction of the canal any lower tolls or greater privileges than we grant to her vessels, but we have built the canal; we own it; we govern it; we regulate it; we maintain it; we protect it; and we have the rights connected with such construction, ownership, regulation, maintenance, and protection.

And it would be absurd to say that we can grant greater privileges to the Republic of Panama for the privilege of spending our money in building the canal than we have ourselves after having constructed it.

FURTHER CONSTRUCTION OF THE TREATY BY THE SENATE IN 1912.

There was another construction of the treaty by the United States Senate. When the Panama Canal toll bill of two years ago came to the House and passed, it went to the Senate. The House had provided that coastwise vessels should not pay tolls.

The Senate by a vote of that body inserted as an amendment a provision exempting from tolls certain vessels of the United States engaged in foreign trade:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade if the owners agree that such vessels may be taken by the United States in time of war or other public emergency, in the discretion of the President, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value at the time of the taking. * * *

That provision went out in conference committee on account of the economic policy involved, but its insertion was a clear construction of our treaty right to exempt all vessels flying our flag from tolls.

AS PRESIDENT TAFT CONSTRUED THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

President Taft, in his message to Congress in December, 1911, said:

I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone, but when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear.

After the passage by both Houses of Congress of the Panama Canal act, President Taft, on August 19, 1912, sent a message to Congress, in which he said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Secretary of War Stimson, in his annual report in 1911, said:

Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances, to my mind, leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal—Spain—has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal. Furthermore, I can see no difference, save in form—provided the tolls for other nations are kept reasonable, as we have also covenanted to do—whether the United States should make this appropriation out of her own Treasury to American vessels, by receiving the toll money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of tolls in the first place.

Secretary of Commerce and Labor Nagel, in his annual report of 1911, said:

Every State in the Union with navigable waters crossing its boundaries furnishes precedents of congressional appropriations for the establishment and maintenance of improvements at the continuing expense of the Federal Treasury and without a dollar's help from the vessels which enjoy the advantages of such improvements. Where the future of American shipping it at stake and the domestic commerce of both seaboards and the Gulf is involved, there is no apparent reason to depart from a principle which has been so constantly invoked. * * *

The Panama Canal is being built in the belief that it will benefit all sections of the country and nearly every form of American industry. Our merchant ships and shipyards are as essential to the Nation as our battleships. They have at least a claim to equal consideration in canal legislation and appropriations with other American industries. Every argument to tax the American merchant ship which uses the canal would apply with equal force to a tax directly on American cotton, lumber, fruit, coal, grain, and other cargo carried by the ship through the canal. It is feasible to use the canal for the promotion of American navigation in a manner consistent with treaty obligations, with precedent at home and abroad, and with our fixed policy of untaxed navigation on improved waterways.

The treaty was also construed the same way in a proposition submitted by myself in the Sixty-first Congress and approved by President Taft, Secretary of War Dickinson, Secretary of State Knox, and others, and which was as follows:

The President is hereby authorized to prescribe and, from time to time, change charges for the use of the canal. Charges may be based upon registered tonnage, displacement tonnage, cargo tonnage, or otherwise, and when based upon registered tonnage shall not exceed $1.50 per net ton, American measurement, nor be less (other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens and vessels of the Republic of Panama) than 50 cents per net ton; nor shall any rate of charge be prescribed which is less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual operation of the canal, subject, however, to the provisions of article 19 of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama entered into November 18, 1903, and the right of the United States to pass its own vessels, troops, materials, merchandise, and supplies without the payment of any charge.

TOLLS ON GOVERNMENT-OWNED VESSELS.

Let us see what our position will be. Suppose the English construction of the treaty shall prevail. Do we pay tolls on our war vessels going through the canal? The treaty treats war vessels and vessels of commerce alike. Do we pay tolls on our war vessels? Well, suppose it be said we do not pay tolls on our war vessels, and suppose, as proposed in the Senate the other day, our cruisers carry freight between the United States and South America. Will we pay tolls on our cruisers engaged in the carrying trade? Or suppose in connection with the Alaskan Railroad we construct a line of steamers between Alaska and Pacific ports and extend it to the Atlantic coast. Do we pay tolls on those vessels? And I pause for any gentleman to answer yes or no who is in favor of this bill. I would like to get a rise out of one of them. Will we be obliged to pay tolls on a Government-owned vessel owned by our Government engaged in commerce? Nobody desires to answer. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MANN. Answer yes or no.

Mr. STEENERSON. I make the statement——

Mr. MANN. Answer yes or no.

Mr. STEENERSON. We do not have to pay on Government-owned vessels, but we do have to pay on vessels that are owned by private persons flying our flag. That is the point I elucidated in my argument in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has refused to yield except on the condition which he stated——

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought I had complied with it.

Mr. MANN. I wanted to get some gentleman who is defending this bill to answer the question. No one can say that a British Government-owned vessel engaged in commerce can pass through the canal without paying tolls. No one will claim that the Government of France, owning a commercial vessel, can pass its vessel through the canal without paying tolls, and if we can and they can not, then we are not on the same terms as they are, and if we have that right under the treaty then we are not governed by that provision of the treaty. [Applause.] But suppose one of those gentlemen who dodged the question should say that we will have to pay tolls on our Government-owned vessels engaged in commerce. Anyone can see that you can not defend the proposition that we do not pay tolls on such vessels without admitting the whole issue. And my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who has reported the pending bill, has put himself on record, and hence was wise enough not to answer. In the bill which he reported to the Congress two years ago and which was amended by the no-tolls provision, over his opposition and protest, he proposed to except from the payment of tolls all vessels belonging to the United States, including those of the Panama Railroad Co. [applause] engaged in commerce and owned by that corporation, the stock of which is owned by our Government, and he then construed the treaty that we were not bound on the same terms as foreign nations.

In that Adamson bill, H. R. 21969 of the Sixty-second Congress, which was enacted into the Panama Canal act, there was the following provision in section 5 of the bill as introduced and as reported favorably by Mr. ADAMSON to the House:

SEC. 5. That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe, and from time to time change, toll charges for the use of the Panama Canal by all vessels, except those belonging to the Government of the United States (including those of the Panama Railroad Co.) and the Government of the Republic of Panama, which excepted vessels shall be charged no tolls.

* * * * * * *

No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States (including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Co.) and the Government of the Republic of Panama, observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal.

* * * * * * *

In reporting that bill in the last Congress, which bill as reported did not exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, Mr. ADAMSON said in his report:

This section requires that tolls shall be imposed and operate uniformly, without preference or discrimination, upon all vessels of all peoples and all nations, except vessels belonging to the Government of Panama and the Government of the United States, which include those of the Panama Railroad, all the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States. These exceptions are made because the "United States enjoys all the rights incident to construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal." As such it is entitled to all the benefits and profits resulting from ownership and operation thereof. As tolls paid out of the Common Treasury would instantly return to the same Common Treasury, such performance would be entirely useless, and in the exercise of common sense will be omitted. We charge other vessels because it is our canal and our service. We pass those belonging to our own Government free because the canal belongs to the Government. The ship and the tolls also belong to the Government. The exemption covers the ships belonging to the Government of Panama because under the facts and the terms of the treaty with her, which by our treaties with Great Britain we were authorized to make, she became a quasi party to the construction and operation. The canal traversing that Republic, we could construct only by making terms with the Republic of Panama with conditions imposed in terms which render her situation akin and analogous to a constructor of the canal. Without her consent it could not have been done, and the exemption of her Government-owned ships conforms to both treaties, and fairly and rightly so.

My friend from Georgia was then preserving what he usually has—common sense—which he has lost just now. [Laughter.] We pass those belonging to our Government free because the Panama Canal belongs to the Government. [Applause.] It was a right of ownership.

SUBSIDY TO FOREIGN VESSELS.

Mr. Speaker, just a word on the subject of subsidies. Personally I never have favored the exemption of the coastwise vessels entirely from payment of tolls; but when it comes to a question of subsidy, which gentlemen talk so much about, what about the subsidy to foreign vessels? We know that when we operate the canal and maintain it and fortify it and put troops upon it to protect it and maintain the sanitation there that we never will have tolls enough to pay back our expenses, much less the interest on the investment, and to that extent we are granting a subsidy to the foreign vessels which use the canal [applause], which they get the benefit of for less than cost; and if it is a subsidy to let an American vessel go through, it is a subsidy to let a foreign vessel go through [applause]; and if we grant a subsidy to the foreign vessel, may we not, if we desire, grant it to the American vessels? [Applause.]

HONOR AND THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

Mr. Speaker, just a word in regard to honor and the Democratic platform.

From the Democratic platform of July 2, 1912:

MERCHANT MARINE.

We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation of commerce the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

We urge upon Congress the speedy enactment of laws for the greater security of life and property at sea, and we favor the repeal of all laws and the abrogation of so much of our treaties with other nations as provide for the arrest and imprisonment of seamen charged with desertion or with violation of their contract of service. Such laws and treaties are un-American, and violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution of the United States.

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

Another paragraph from Democratic platform of 1912:

CONCLUSION.

Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

We are told that it is a matter of honor for this country to rescind all of its previous interpretations of this treaty and to surrender our rights forever because England has expressed a dissentient view. There may be some controversy on that point. There is a difference of opinion as to the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It may be that gentlemen can say, "I think that honor requires us to rescind our action," and others can say, "I think that honor requires us to maintain our position." [Applause.] But there can be no controversy over the question as to whether honor requires the Democratic Party to live up to its platform. [Applause on the Republican side.] Here are gentlemen who have been elected to Congress upon a platform which expressly declares in favor of free tolls, who went before the country appealing for election on their platform, and then have the gall to come before the country and say that honor requires them to have lied to their constituents. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Honor! You who adopted a platform in express language and were elected upon that platform of express language propose now to repudiate the platform upon which you were elected in order, as you say, to keep a promise made by a Republican President and a Republican Senate 12 years ago. Honor! [Laughter.] And a gentleman here on the floor of this House said that his honor was saved because a Democratic Member of Congress must not construe any plank in the platform; that the construction by the President was "infallible." Infallible! On our side of the House Members of Congress may think [loud applause on the Republican side]; we may use our judgment; we have a right to read. On your side of the House you are bound by an infallible construction. You ought to be Indian tobacco signs—wooden men. And then you have the nerve to say that the plank in your platform for free tolls is in violation of your plank against ship subsidies, and both provisions appear in the same section of the platform. [Applause on the Republican side.] First in your platform you oppose subsidies and immediately following it, as part of the same plank, say that you are in favor of no tolls on our coastwise trade, and then have the nerve to say, "We were facing both ways; we were appealing to both sides; we have no honor in appealing to the American people; but we are great on honor in dealing with England." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

We are not without advice on the subject of party platforms. The Payne tariff bill which passed this House you alleged throughout the country was a violation of the Republican platform of 1908, and, though the claim was denied, you won the victory before the country on two charges. One was the gagging of debate and the right of amendment and consideration in the House of Representatives, and the other was the failure of the Republicans to carry out their platform pledges of 1908. You won the election when there was a dispute as to the meaning of our platform. There will be no dispute this time. From every rostrum of the country, both Republican, Progressive, and, in many cases, Democratic, you will hear resound from one end of the land to the other, "The Democrats gained power under false pretenses; they put the gag rule in force; they repudiated the platform; they said they had lied to the American people. Turn them out!" [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, there are some gentlemen here like the gentleman from Tennessee, who excuse themselves for voting in favor of this bill because the President tells them to do so. Let me quote you a line or two from a very distinguished leader of your party on the subject of following the President's will instead of your own judgment. Secretary of State Bryan was a Member of this House in 1893, when a special session of Congress was here for the purpose of considering the repeal of the Sherman silver purchasing act. Mr. Bryan said on the floor of this House:

To whom are we responsible? It is before the tribunal established by our constituencies, and before that tribunal only, that we must appear for judgment upon our actions here. When we each accepted a commission from 180,000 people we pledged ourselves to protect their rights from invasion and to reflect their wishes to the best of our ability, and we must stand defenseless before the bar if our only excuse is, "He recommended it."

[Applause on the Republican side.]

IN TIME OF WAR.

Mr. Speaker, if we shall reverse our position, repudiate the many constructions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty heretofore made by us, and adopt the English contention that the United States has no greater rights in the canal, except to pay the expenses, than any other nation, we shall in the future meet many grave problems and come up against many strong contentions which will embarrass us beyond our present conception.

For instance, the Panama Canal act, which we passed two years ago, contains a provision which was then favored by everybody in the House and the Senate, and which reads as follows:

SEC. 13. That in time of war in which the United States shall be engaged, or when, in the opinion of the President, war is imminent, such officer of the Army as the President may designate shall, upon the order of the President, assume and have exclusive authority and jurisdiction over the operation of the Panama Canal and all of its adjuncts, appendants, and appurtenances, including the entire control and government of the Canal Zone. * * *

This provision of the law assumes that in time of war we shall treat the canal as though we had full military authority there, and we can not defend the provision if we admit the correctness of the present English contention.

What will be our rights at the canal if we shall ever be engaged in war with some other nation? Gentlemen have frequently stated that war ended all treaties, and hence the Hay-

Pauncefote treaty would not be binding on us in case of war. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that that contention be correct as between the United States and Great Britain, it is certain that the treaty with Great Britain would not be set aside by a war between the United States and some country other than Great Britain. Our treaty is with Great Britain.

In the history of mankind we have now reached the point where our race meets the Asiatic race. Our interests are moving toward the west, and their interests are moving toward the east. It is inevitable that at some time in the future, and perhaps many times, we will come into bitter conflict with one or more of the Asiatic nations. Suppose at some time we should have a war with Japan, which is now the ally of England. Suppose the Japanese fleet arrives at Panama and asks permission to pass through the canal. Suppose England should say to us, "Under your treaty with us Japanese vessels have the same rights in the canal that your vessels have." It would create a delicate situation, which might involve us in trouble with Great Britain.

There are many other questions which can and undoubtedly will sometime arise as to our rights in the canal in time of war if we admit England's construction of the treaty. Could we maintain a fleet of war vessels in the canal or within 3 miles of the entrance? Plainly no other country when at war can do this, and under the English construction our vessels can have no greater rights than the vessels of other nations.

THE TOLLS ARE LOW.

We have announced the rate of tolls for passing through the canal. No country has taken exception to them. They are lower than at the Suez Canal. England is, in effect, the owner of the Suez Canal. It is operated to make a great profit for its shareholders; but, with our enormous investment in the Panama Canal and the enormous cost of sanitation and protection, we have made lower tolls at Panama than England at Suez. This is in the interest of the commerce of the world. We have not acted selfishly. We have spent our treasure freely, that the world's commerce might profit by it. Other nations enjoy the benefit of our expenditures.

WE ARE THE OWNERS.

And now has arisen the question, What are our rights in the canal? The proposition is a plain and simple one. England contends that our special rights in the canal are merely the right to pay the bills. We are to stand the expense. Other nations are to get the benefits. We pay the bills, they reap the rewards. We are to keep the Canal Zone free from dangerous disease in order that others may pass through the canal safely. We are to maintain fortifications and keep an army and navy to protect the canal from seizure and to enforce our duty to give other nations reasonable tolls and privileges in passing through the canal, but we are to have no special rights for ourselves. This is the English contention which has been hastily and unadvisedly accepted and urged upon us by President Wilson. I protest against it as foolish, unpatriotic, and un-American. I maintain that we own the canal and that, while it is our moral duty and our treaty obligation to give to foreign nations equal treatment in the canal and reasonable tolls for its use, the United States as the owner and the practical sovereign is supreme there, and that this country is on a different footing, as the owner of the canal, from all other countries as the mere users of the canal.

HONOR DOES NOT COMPEL US TO YIELD.

I deny that honor compels us to yield our rights. We have as great a duty to our descendants as we have to England. I would not for a moment violate any of our treaty obligations. Those who take the English side in this controversy assume that we will violate our treaty obligations in case we have war. I shall always endeavor to maintain all of our treaty obligations, but I am unwilling to admit that every obligation is against us. We have presented this canal for the use of the world. No other country will derive so great a benefit from its use as Great Britain. She is not called upon to help protect the canal, as was provided in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Her citizens have not been called upon to pay any portion of its cost, as was contemplated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. She assumes no responsibilities in connection with the canal which call for the expenditure of her money. She only gets benefit from the canal, and when the English Government now contends that we who built the canal have, in fact, no special rights in it she is exceeding the proper limits of friendly intercourse. England is raising a feeling against her in the United States which will not soon die out.

Just a word more and I shall conclude, though if time permitted I would like to call attention to many other propositions.

Mr. Speaker, we will never operate the Panama Canal at a profit. We made a present of it to the world. We have made low rates of toll for passage through it, lower than the Suez Canal, though its cost is much greater. No one has questioned the reasonableness of the rates which we have prescribed, and if it should be decided by our country that we as owners of the canal are not to govern it, there will arise in the future a thousand perplexing problems as time goes on, and when some day we shall be engaged in war, as is certain to come, under stress of strife, the decision we make now may determine our liberties in the future. [Applause on the Republican side.] We can maintain our country as against the world if we take the proper position. President Wilson says he does not know how to deal with questions of greater delicacy and greater importance in our foreign relations. I can tell him. If he will deal with foreign countries in the spirit of justice and firmness, maintaining the rights of America and the interests of our people, standing up for American liberties and American interests, he will have behind him all parties and all peoples in our country, holding up his hands, and no one will dare disturb him. [Loud and long continued applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I favor the repeal of the clause in the canal act exempting vessels engaged in coastwise trade from payment of tolls, because it is unfair to the people who built and paid for the canal. It is nothing more nor less than a ship subsidy—a special privilege of the most pronounced type. My constituency, regardless of party, have always been bitterly opposed to payment of taxes into the Treasury for the purpose of handing the money out again to favored classes in the form of subsidies. The idea of paying $400,000,000 to build a canal and $16,000,000 a year to maintain it and then permitting the Shipping Trust to use it free of tolls does not appeal to the people of Nebraska. The average man feels that we have done enough when we have put up the capital to furnish the shipping interests a canal that reduces the length of the coast-to-coast trip some 9,000 miles without having to pay the expense of conducting their ships through the canal. He feels that it is a piece of unmitigated gall for the Shipping Trust to ask the people of this country to pay this expense for them. The claim that the exemption of tolls would cheapen the price of products passing through the canal to the people is not proven by the facts, and if it were proven and there were none to question it, the fact still remains that we could also reduce the price of products passing over the railroads to the people by having the Treasury of the United States pay the freight for the people. There is just as much sense in having the United States pay railway freight as to have them pay ocean freight by this roundabout method of exempting tolls.

The economical phase of the question is sufficient in itself to justify the repeal of the exemption clause, but there are other reasons just as vital. It is vital to our future commercial relations with other nations that we be fair and square in our interpretation of treaties. We have stalked about over the face of the earth and demanded equal rights in every canal under the sun, and got equal rights for our commerce. We fought with England and Canada for years for equal rates through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, in the Great Lakes, owned by Canada, and we finally got the same rates for our commerce that Canadian shippers had for theirs.

This canal carries about four times the tonnage that the Panama Canal is estimated to carry the first year of its operation. To insist upon exempting our coastwise commerce from tolls through Panama Canal would mark us out as inconsistent and unfair, and would leave Canada free to make a discriminatory rate in favor of Canadian commerce through the Soo and Welland Canals in the Great Lakes through which untold millions of bushels of grain passes every year from our wheat farms of the West to the eastern markets. If Canada should retaliate and exempt her commerce on the Lakes from payment of tolls and leave our commerce to pay excessive tolls for the use of her canals, every acre of land and bushel of wheat in Canada would be enhanced in value and every acre of land and bushel of wheat in our wheat States would be correspondingly depressed because of the discriminatory tax. A Member from the Central West who votes to discriminate against Canada in favor of our domestic commerce passing through the Panama Canal will also be voting to let Canada do the same thing in the Great Lakes in favor of her commerce. Since our Lake commerce will always greatly exceed our Panama commerce, it is apparent that such a course is economical suicide. Not only would our commerce suffer in the Great Lakes, but in every other canal on the face of the earth where it would be possible for those in control to discriminate against us. Not only would these foreign competitors technically oppose us wherever they could, but they would have a tremendous advantage over us on account of the moral question involved. The plain, cold-blooded fact that we have always demanded equal rights with domestic commerce of nations controlling canals in every other canal in the world and at the very first opportunity we have we try to discriminate in favor of our own commerce by forcing foreign commerce to pay all the tolls, places us in a position that is humiliating in the extreme, and I can not understand the logic of those who view it in any other light.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, in discussing this important subject, the repeal of a part of the act for the government of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912, it should be done in an impartial and an unprejudiced manner, free from party politics.

The part affected by this amendment, that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," is to be stricken out; and the vessels of all countries are to pay the same charges for passage through the Panama Canal.

This act was passed in the second session of the Sixty-second Congress. It was signed by President Taft August 24, 1912. It was the result of an enlightened public sentiment, as expressed in the platform of the Democratic Party adopted in 1912 at Baltimore. The President, in his address before Congress on March 5, asks for the repeal of the provision above cited, claiming that it is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain of November 18, 1901.

Our foreign trade is in the hands of our commercial rivals. The only hope for our merchant marine is the coastwise trade, secured to the country by wise legislation. The present Panama Canal act will tend to increase and advance it. It has no effect whatever on the foreign trade under our flag.

As a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House for eight years, I persistently and energetically opposed ship subsidy. I deny emphatically that the exemption of coastwise vessels is in any sense a subsidy or bounty.

It simply applies the same policy in practice since the beginning of the Government to all waterways of the country.

The three candidates for the Presidency in 1912 explicitly declared for this law.

The Democratic platform was clear and forceful on this subject, and I feel it to be my conscientious duty to vote against repealing this wise and patriotic measure.

I quote extracts from the views of Lewis Nixon, an authority on international law:

We had exact language employed in the Clayton-Bulwer convention to secure equality of treatment, but we search in vain for any similar or analogous expressions in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty bound us hand and foot and fastened upon the United States every restriction of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Happily this betrayal of the rights and interests of our country was rejected by a patriotic Senate.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention says that the two Governments agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practical route. So the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty proposed, while purporting to remove any objection to the building of the canal which may arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, was in reality an adroitly worded supplement to that convention. It extended by treaty the stipulated joint protection by which equal treatment was to be secured as outlined in the second paragraph of article 8. It did not supersede the Clayton-Bulwer convention. It adopted rules forbidding discrimination under any condition, either of peace or war, and made the building of the canal a partnership affair in which the United States bore all the burdens and at the same time, through the limitations incurred under the rules of article 3, barred the United States from enjoying any of the rights incident to construction.

Of course, this first treaty is a very tender subject with those sympathizing with Great Britain, but the gradual shaping of the betrayal of our country's rights and interests as existing in the first treaty into the final treaty gives us a ready means of finding out the intent of the last treaty as ratified and the pourparlers leading to the changes show plainly the acceptance by Great Britain of such changes not blindly but with perfect understanding of their purport.

Now, the first treaty did extend such joint protection by treaty stipulation, and simply supplemented the Clayton-Bulwer convention; but this adroit attempt to secure equal treatment was frustrated by a patriotic Senate.

As provided by the Clayton-Bulwer convention, the canal specified to run through Nicaragua was to be neutralized by the two nations jointly; they were to join in the burdens, they were to join in the protection, and they were to join hand in hand in controlling the canal and in seeing that all nations did have exactly the same treatment by the company building this canal through a territory alien to each of them.

This partnership control you will see has been definitely and permanently ended by the last treaty, and this termination, we see from the pourparlers, proves beyond question that Great Britain understood this and acted in complete accord with such understanding.

Equality of treatment under article 8 was the return for a joint assumption of burden and responsibility, yet the British contention is that since a certain privilege was obtained through joining in protection this privilege must continue, even though Great Britain is relieved from this expensive and burdensome responsibility; that is, in absence of explicit yielding to Great Britain, our rights are to be limited or destroyed by implication. But happily the wording of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is clear upon this point. Is it "equal treatment" or "neutrality" that is carried over from article 8? The preamble to the articles of the treaty says: "The objections that may arise from the Clayton-Bulwer convention to the construction of the canal are to be removed without impairing the general principle of 'neutralization established in article 8.' We supersede the treaty in every other respect."

Rule 1 of article 3 says that the United States adopts as the basis of neutralization certain rules substantially as embodied in the Suez Canal treaty. And further light is thrown upon the meaning by the fact that in modifying the Suez rules only such parts as provided for neutralization were retained and all references to equal treatment thrown out.

But Great Britain and some American supporters of her protest say that so long as she is not permitted to join in protection that neutrality secured by our protection becomes the same as equal treatment secured by joint protection. It shows the demoralization of the public mind on this question when such preposterous conclusions are taken seriously. I should be the last one to decry British diplomatic capacity, nor do I find anything wrong in their diplomats making the best case possible for their Government. They certainly act upon Madame de Stael's saying that "The patriotism of nations ought to be selfish." It has long been a favorite expedient of British diplomatists to lay claims long in advance through pourparlers. So the ingenious attempts up to the last minute to retain a partnership or contract participation in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to be expected.

In a large number of communications received from organized bodies and individuals in my district all but two were against the bill. I quote from but two to show the sentiment prevalent there:

BOROUGH OF THE BRONX, N. Y., March 26, 1914.

At a regular monthly meeting of the North Side Board of Trade held on Wednesday evening, March 25, 1914, the following resolution was adopted, and the secretary authorized to send you copy of same:

"Whereas the question of tolls for American vessels in now before Congress.

"Resolved, That the North Side Board of Trade favors the exemption of American coastwise vessels from such tolls on the Panama Canal when going to or between American ports; and be it further "Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to our Representatives in Congress at Washington, D. C.

Yours, very truly,

[SEAL.] CHARLES E. REID, Secretary.

DEMOCRATIC COUNTY COMMITTEE OF BRONX COUNTY,
New York, March 25, 1914.

Hon. JOSEPH A. GOULDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Your letter of the 24th instant regarding the question of repealing the section of law exempting American vessels from the payment of tolls in the Panama Canal and requesting to know the sentiment of the party in the twenty-third congressional district to hand. Personally I believe that a majority of the people whom you represent in Congress desire the retention of the law as it is at present upon our statute books.

With all good wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours, ARTHUR H. MURPHY,
Chairman.

The subject presents but one issue and that is the principle involved.

Has the Congress of the United States the right to control its own property, its own shipping, its own interstate commerce? That is all there is to it, aside from the Democratic platform upon which President Wilson was elected.

Not being a lawyer, but simply an everyday business man, I am not an authority on the legal interpretation of treaties, but must stand on the judgment of others. However, when distinguished and eminent members of the bar differ so widely as they do on the real meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote document, as a layman, I must be allowed the privilege of drawing my own conclusions on a basis of common sense and as an American citizen.

On the occasion of the twenty-sixth annual dinner of one of the leading clubs in my district, held on the 21st of February, 1914, I had the privilege of listening to a learned and carefully prepared address on this subject by Justice Samuel Seabury, a lawyer of high standing of the New York State Supreme Court. I will take the liberty of inserting his speech in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and rest my case with this splendid speech.

[From the New York American, February 22, 1914.]

The justice said:

"I contend, under well-established rules of international law, that as the state of things which was the basis of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty has changed, and as the United States has now become sovereign over that territory, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is now voidable at the option of the United States. The Panama Canal is as much the sole and exclusive property of the United States as if the canal had been built from San Francisco to New Orleans. The treaty was made on the assumption that the canal was to be built in alien territory. The condition in reference to which the treaty was made never rose, and instead of the canal being built in alien territory it was built in territory of the United States.

"The British protest concedes that some of the conditions of the treaty have been modified by subsequent events. If that be so, then the whole treaty is voidable. If the state of things which was the vital condition of the treaty no longer exists, the whole treaty may be abrogated. Either all of its terms are binding or none of them is binding. It can hardly be asserted, with any support in international law, that if changes so vital have transpired that some of the terms of the treaty are extinguished; that one of the parties to the treaty can determine which of the other provisions of the treaty shall continue to be binding upon the other party to the compact.

ENGLAND'S SEIZURE OF SUEZ.

"So much has been said about the fact that Great Britain has sanctioned the neutralization of the Suez Canal, and that the claim of Great Britain as to Panama is merely that the United States shall act toward Panama in the same spirit in which it is claimed Great Britain has acted toward the Suez Canal, that it becomes important to inquire how Great Britain has acted toward the Suez Canal, and to what extent she has in fact recognized the principle of neutrality.

"The attitude of Great Britain toward the Suez Canal is well summed up by Mr. Keasby, when he says: 'So England allowed France the glory of constructing the canal and quietly proceeded to secure legal control of the company by buying out the majority of the shares. Having already secured possession of Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus, on the Mediterranean side of the canal, Great Britain also acquired the island of Perim, at the Red Sea outlet, and completed her protective system by the occupation of Egypt. In this way England secured economical and political control of the Suez Canal to the practical exclusion of the French. These matters of fact in nowise interfered, however, with the theoretical neutralization of the route, which proceeded through the necessary stages, and was eventually proclaimed as a triumph of international diplomacy and cited as a precedent to guide those who, in the future, should undertake an enterprise of similar character in America.'

CANAL NEVER NEUTRAL.

"Notwithstanding the alleged neutralization of the Suez Canal, Great Britain, in fact, has never recognized the principle of neutrality in the Suez Canal as binding upon her. The chief purpose of Great Britain in controlling the Suez Canal is not to preserve a complete neutrality, but to use the canal for the purpose of mobilization of her fleets and to prevent her enemies from using the short road to India and China. The neutralization which Great Britain has insisted upon is a policy which restrains her enemies and all other nations, but leaves her free to act as her interests require. 'The fact has been generally overlooked,' says Dr. Latane, 'that Great Britain signed this convention (Suez Canal) with an important reservation. At the last sitting of the Paris commission, June 13, 1885, Sir Julian Pauncefote announced that the British delegates felt it their duty to formulate a general reservation as to the application of the treaty, in so far as its provisions might be incompatible with the 'present transitory and exceptional conditions of Egypt' and in so far as they 'might fetter the liberty of action of their Government during the occupation of Egypt by the forces of Her Britannic Majesty.'

"In other words, the position of Great Britain is that, while she continues to occupy Egypt, the alleged neutralization of the Suez Canal is not binding upon her. 'This amounts,' said Prof. Woolsey, 'to protection so long as England occupies Egypt; neutralization afterwards.' Prof. Woolsey also quotes Prof. Holland to the effect that 'it is owing to this reservation that, as was explained by Mr. Curzon in the House of Commons July 12, 1898, the terms of this reservation have not been brought into practical operation.' Upon this point also Prof. Woolsey quotes an English writer who says in reality 'the neutral convention was never brought into force and is now a dead letter.'

"The canal will soon be opened by the United States to the commerce of the world on fair and reasonable terms. The question for this country now to determine is whether it shall adopt an American canal policy or whether it shall adopt an Anglo-American canal policy. In this emergency we may well need the advice of Gen. Grant when he said, 'I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people.'

"The Panama Canal is the gateway that is destined to open to the United States an opportunity to secure its share in the commerce of the world. American energy and enterprise have built it, American money has paid for it; it is constructed on American soil and is subject to American sovereignty. Why should we not retain it? Why should we admit Great Britain as equal partner in its benefits, although we alone continue to bear its burdens? Justice to our own people, a proper self-respect and regard for our own rights require that we should refuse to yield to the British protest and that we should firmly refuse to enter into an Anglo-American alliance as to the control of our own canal."

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any question before the American Congress has so engrossed the public mind as the Panama tolls controversy. I have read every line available to me on this subject, listened to the various arguments for and against the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, and my mind is clear on the subject. I shall vote against the present bill and in favor of exemption of American ships passing through the canal from the payment of tolls. From an economic standpoint I question neither the wisdom nor the justice of this policy. The Panama Canal belongs to the people of the United States; it was built by their money; it will be maintained at their expense, and the people of the United States are entitled to such benefit as should accrue from its ownership and its sovereignty. We might as well charge tolls for American vessels going up and down the Mississippi River, kept navigable by national expenditures, as to charge American vessels tolls for going through the Panama Canal. We might as well charge the farmer tolls on highways built at the national expense as to make charge on our internal commerce. While on economic grounds alone I would feel justified in voting for exemption of American vessels passing through the canal, whether engaged in the coastwise trade or not, yet, without regard to economic considerations, the interpretation of our treaty on this subject with Great Britain is involved. Great Britain claims that we would violate our treaty obligations if we make such exemption. Interpreting the treaty in line with every President who has dealt with this subject, President Roosevelt, in whose administration the treaty was signed; President Taft, in whose administration this treaty was first interpreted; and President Wilson, when he was a candidate, and acting on my own independent judgment, I have no question in stating that I believe we have the right under the terms of this treaty to exempt all American vessels from the payment of tolls in going through the canal.

I contend that the American people have all the rights over this canal incident to the sovereignty of the canal, which sovereignty is recognized not only by England but by all the rest of the world. Such rights include the right to deal with our domestic situation and our domestic shipping as we see fit. I have great respect for the ability, the patriotism, and the purity of motive of President Wilson, but in asking Congress to reverse itself on the tolls question he is committing a wrong in economics unjustified by any language in any treaty, in open violation of his own professions while a candidate before the people for election, and without the approval of a majority of his fellow countrymen. I shall vote for no proposition to surrender at the dictation of a foreign power any rights owned by, paid for by the American people and secured at such sacrifice of time and money. I ask, therefore, to be recorded in favor of the exemption of American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade; and if I had the opportunity I would vote to exempt all American vessels passing through the canal from the payment of tolls.

Mr. JOHNSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the present bill now under consideration, because I believe that its purpose is to surrender to a foreign power a valuable right which justly belongs to my Government and the people thereof.

This bill is based upon the request of the President of the United States.

On the 5th day of March last, the President of the United States appeared at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress and delivered an address, in which he said, in part:

> I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation. I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

I ask, Who in this House has ever heard such language uttered by a President of the United States before?

The law to be repealed is a part of section 5 of an act of Congress approved August 24, 1912. Page 562, volume 37, United States Statutes at Large, reads as follows:

> No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

It will be remembered that under the laws of the United States no foreign vessel is permitted to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States. But it is contended that that part of the statutes sought to be repealed is in violation of the so-called Hay-Pauncefote treaty of November 18, 1901.

Let us examine the terms of the treaty alleged to be violated by the above provision, and in doing so, it is well to remember that every written instrument is to be interpreted in the light of the facts and circumstances under which it came to be executed, tested by such rules of construction, and construing each and every article thereof together.

Article 11, after reciting the authority of the Government of the United States to construct the canal at its own expense, proceeds:

> The said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Section 1 of article 11 provides:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Now, it appears to me, that as no foreign vessels are permitted to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, that they are not concerned in the terms upon which the vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States are permitted to pass through the canal, for they do not come in competition in their business and therefore there is no discrimination.

There was no thought of the violation of any agreement or of the offending of any European power when this measure was undertaken. It was purely domestic and local—not extending to world commerce, not affecting the balance of nations.

Our English brethren came to the front with a protest. They complained that American coasting vessels were exempted from tolls. They protested that there was an agreement—a treaty between England and America, and they pointed to this clause in it:

(1) The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing those rules on terms of entire equality.

No other nation has joined with England in the protest.

They did not quote the second article of the treaty, which reads:

The United States shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to the construction of the canal, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its maintenance and management.

They did not call attention to this prime fact that the words "vessels of commerce of all nations" could not include coastwise shipping, for in both England and America the coastwise traffic is monopolized by the two countries, respectively, each for itself.

They did not call attention to their own construction of law when it is applied to conditions of coastwise shipping, not to their own establishing of precedent in such matters. Let me do it now.

Since 1815 there has been in force a treaty between England and America containing this provision:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

For nearly a hundred years that treaty has been practically construed by the two nations, and it is so that American overseas vessels have been charged and are charged high rates, while English coastwise vessels have been charged and are charged low rates, while England has continued its monopoly of coastwise trade.

For example, in the English port of Bristol the charges per ton for American over-seas vessels is 1s. 1½d. per ton, while the charge on English coasting vessels is 5d. a ton. In the port of Liverpool the charge for American vessels is 1s. 4d. per ton and for English coasting vessels is 4½d. to 6d. per ton.

America has not complained. Indeed, the situation with respect to that treaty has been recognized in American jurisprudence. In the case of Olsen against Smith, reported in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Reports, it was decided that under the treaty of 1815 a British vessel engaged in overseas trade was not entitled to exemption accorded to the American coasting trade. England never questioned the decision.

But there is other fundamental reasoning under the American position. The two treaties—Clayton-Bulwer and Hay-Pauncefote—were made in contemplation of the building of the canal on foreign territory. The first treaty provided definitely that England and America would protect the canal. It was the understanding that the same protection would continue under the second treaty.

But the present situation is altogether different. The canal, built by American money and brains, is entirely on American land; and without doubt that situation relieves England from any burden of protection, while it makes the canal a domestic waterway and stamps the gift of its privileges to the whole world as a wonder of generosity.

In this matter, where England is relieved of an enormous burden, her statesmen quickly saw that the treaty had been modified by the locating of the canal on American territory. I quote from the British note of protest:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government does not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

By the construction of a new river on our own land we have connected the western and the eastern coasts of our country, so that now our coasting vessels may go freely and quickly wherever they will on the national coast line. It is as much on our land as though it ran from New York to San Francisco. We permit the use of the canal to all nations equally with our own, but we do not admit other nations the privilege of our coasting trade, which contains almost all that is left of American shipping.

There is no justification in morals or in the letter of the law for the unmannerly interference of England with our domestic affairs and for her insistence that we put toll burdens on our own domestic coastwise shipping.

There is no reason why the present national administration should undo that which was done by the administration that created the canal and laid it in American soil.

The great gift of America to the world, with its priceless advantages to England, should have been received in the fine spirit of the gift and not with insistence for more gifts and greater gifts.

The world record of generosity is marred by the unkind demand and protest of the nation which has received much and done nothing. She has paid no consideration for the advantages she has received and none for those which now she demands.

But have we violated our treaty with Great Britain? I deny it. A more outrageously impudent pretense has never been advanced than the claim that in exempting from tolls our coastwise ships passing through the canal we have violated any treaty whatever, either in its letter or its spirit.

This question has been discussed so fully here and elsewhere that I will confine myself to one aspect of it which I do not think has received the attention which it deserves, and which, in my judgment, furnishes a test by which the merit of the British claim can easily be determined to the satisfaction of any reasonable man. Here is the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we are charged with having violated:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Now, what does that language prohibit? It is a rule of construction that every written instrument is to be interpreted in the light of the facts and circumstances under which and through which it came to be executed. And the reason for this is obvious. Neither individuals nor nations execute written instruments for the mere fun of attaching signatures to writings on parchment or paper. Written instruments are executed to meet certain conditions, to accomplish or facilitate certain purposes. Now, what were the conditions under which that treaty was adopted, and what purpose was it negotiated to promote or subserve?

Its purpose was to promote and facilitate construction of a canal by the United States on territory which was then foreign—but which has since been annexed by the United States—upon condition, however, that when constructed it should not be used to give the ships of one nation any advantage over ships of other nations. That is to say, the merchant ships of one country should not by means of this canal be given any advantage over merchant ships of other countries in competing for trade, nor the warships of one country be afforded any advantage over the warships of other countries in the activities of war. The thing to be facilitated was construction of a canal; the thing to be prevented was use of the canal itself to establish new discriminations and distinctions between vessels of different countries. The object of the treaty was not to change relations between nations as they existed at that time, but to prevent use of the canal as an agency by which changes in them might be forced or effected.

Now, when that treaty was signed coastwise traffic in the United States was limited, as it is now, to American ships. No foreign ships could engage in it. How, then, could it be possible to discriminate against ships of foreign nations in a trade from which they were and are absolutely excluded? How could we discriminate against them in a field to which they are not even admitted? Exclusion is itself discrimination in its most sweeping and drastic form. But that exclusion, that discrimination, existed before this treaty was signed or drafted or even considered. Since no foreign nation had the right to interfere in our coastwise commerce before the signing of the treaty, can it be pretended now with any shadow of plausibility that such a right has been acquired by one foreign power through a treaty which had preservation of the status quo in this respect for its very purpose?

We did agree to establish no advantages against any other nation through control of this canal, and to that bargain, foolish and extravagant though it be, every American who loves his country and values her honor is willing to adhere. But besides investing our money lavishly to the amount of $400,000,000 for the purposes of establishing a great waterway, and then holding this property, created on our own territory by our own capital, our own labor, and our own enterprise, not for the exclusive benefit of our own citizens but in trust for the benefit of all nations, we did not in addition undertake to subject our domestic economy to the control, criticism, or scrutiny of any foreign power.

The right which England enjoyed before this canal was built or this treaty was signed was to compete with us for ocean transportation over the high seas on absolutely equal terms, but she should not engage in our coastwise trade. That right she enjoys to-day in the use of the canal, subject to that same limitation.

Granting that this exemption from tolls may double or quadruple the profits of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, how could that result affect English shipowners and merchants, since English ships have been excluded from that trade absolutely long before this canal was even contemplated?

It has been said that since rates of tolls for passage through the canal are to be adjusted according to the cost of maintaining it, if our coastwise ships be allowed to use it free they would be enjoying benefit at the expense of other shipping. This objection shows the straits to which supporters of this measure are reduced for an argument to justify it. Assuming that free use of the canal by our coastwise ships will increase the cost of maintenance to be met by tolls, this increased cost must be borne by our ships engaged in foreign trade, as well as by all other ships. There is no discrimination here between vessels flying the American flag and those of other nations.

It is a fundamental rule of law that a party to an agreement will not be heard to complain of a violation by the other party unless he can show he has suffered some damage. What damages could England show before a tribunal empowered to enforce this treaty by reason of this exemption? And where no damage can be shown, no injury has been suffered.

But it may be asked why, then, should England have protested against this exemption. Protests are not made by great powers for the mere pleasure of engaging in diplomatic correspondence.

The reason is simple. While there is no shadow of justification for claiming that vessels engaged in coastwise trade fall within the operation of this section, there is some color for claiming that warships of every country are within its provisions. England's purpose is plain to everybody who is familiar with her history, except, apparently, the President, who does not seem to understand it, and Mr. Bryan, who has probably forgotten it. If this protest of the British Government can be entertained or even seriously considered, a demand that the warships of all nations be accorded equal rights in the use of the canal can not be even debated, much less denied.

If we were at war to-morrow and England's forbearance became more important to us even than it is now in Mexico, does anybody think she would hesitate long in formulating such a demand, which would be much more reasonable than that which Mr. Wilson is willing to concede now even without discussion?

There is but one nation with whom we are at all likely to become engaged in serious trouble. The Government of that nation, I am sure, is just as anxious to avoid war with us as we are to keep the peace ourselves. But there is an irrepressible source of irritation between the two nations running, far too deep to be controlled by their Governments. The great desire of the Japanese to enter the United States and the passionate determination of people on the Pacific coast to exclude them might at any moment precipitate acts of violence which could not fail to provoke the most serious consequences. I do not believe this is probable, but it is well within the bounds of possibility. It is the only occurrence within the bounds of reasonable possibility that might disturb the peace of this country. It must not be forgotten that England and Japan are allies. If we tolerate this pretension on the part of England now, the consequences that might follow in case we became engaged in war with Japan should be matter of serious consideration to officers charged with the safety of this Nation.

It may be asked, Do I deny that there is any question here at all? Well, since Mr. Wilson's appearance in the House I can not deny it. But until the President of the United States took a position hostile to the established policy of his country—until he became the advocate of a claim which had been rejected by this Nation—I never for a moment believed that there was a plausible ground for the pretension which Mr. Wilson now asks authority to concede on behalf of the United States.

A large part of the controversy arises about the meaning of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The first provision of this article is as follows:

> That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

The first contention arises over whether the provision was intended to apply to the United States included in the term "all nations." In determining this we should firmly consider the situation. The treaty was being negotiated by Great Britain; but as it repeatedly claimed not for itself alone, but for all other nations as well. In other words, this was a treaty, the parties to which were the United States on one side and "all nations" on the other. Under a previous treaty Great Britain and the United States agreed that neither would build or obtain exclusive control of any Isthmian Canal; that they would jointly protect any canal that should be built, guarantee its neutrality, just and equitable rates, and equality of treatment to all.

Nothing was done under this treaty, and in 1901 a new treaty was made by which the United States undertook to build the canal, to protect and maintain it, and to guarantee neutrality, equality of treatment, and just and equitable charges to all nations. Which party undertook the enterprise and guaranteed equality of treatment and just and equitable charges? The United States. What was the other party that was to receive equality of treatment and just and equitable charges? All other nations. There is no other logical or sensible interpretation to be given to the language used. It is absurd to claim that the United States must be regarded on both sides of the contract. It alone made the investment, assumed the management, undertook the protection, and in doing so agreed to allow the free use of the canal to all other nations upon terms of equality and upon conditions and charges that should be just and reasonable.

It should be observed that the phrase "all nations" is qualified by the phrase "observing these rules." What rules? Why the rules which "the United States adopts" for the government of the canal. That is to say, the Government of the United States agrees to impose these rules, which are specified, and agrees that any and "all nations observing these rules" shall be entitled to use the canal on terms of equality and shall be charged therefor only "just and equitable tolls." This is a pledge and guaranty to all other nations, and it is unreasonable to claim that the United States was providing and guaranteeing these things to itself.

The next clause on which argument is made is as follows:

> So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise, such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This provision would prevent the United States from discrimination against any nation willing to observe the rules which the United States prescribes, and guarantees that all conditions imposed and charges fixed shall be just and reasonable. It will prevent the United States from imposing more tolls or greater exaction on one nation than another. That is the meaning and all the meaning there is in it. To construe it into denying that the United States might use the canal as it chose is to torture the language into something never intended and utterly foreign.

One wonders why gentlemen always commence their discussion of the canal with article 3 of the treaty. Why is article 1, which provides in express terms that the new treaty "shall supersede" the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, not quoted and discussed? And why is article 2, which provides that the United States shall have "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," not referred to? And why is that part of article 3 which provides that only those "nations observing these rules"—rules which the United States adopts for the regulation and management of the canal—shall have the privilege of using the canal not also discussed?

It ought to be clear when the United States promises to allow the use of its canal by the observance of its rules for such use, and promises equality of treatment in such use to all nations who so obey its rules, that it is not making rules for its own use of the canal.

The language of the treaty is that the United States guarantees to all nations the free use of the canal if they will observe "these rules" which the United States prescribes. "These rules"—they are the conditions the observance of which entitles other nations to the use of the canal. It is absurd to claim that when we were making rules by which we were to allow the use of the canal to other nations we should have included in a treaty the terms by which a part of our own domestic traffic should use our own canal. Congress is given power to regulate our commerce, not the President by treaties with foreign countries.

The United States does not use its own canal by virtue of any rules. It uses it because it built it, paid for it, and owns it. It has bound itself not to deny its use to any other nation, not to give any such nation any advantage over any other, but it may use the canal itself as it chooses.

A labored argument is made upon the ground that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that "the general principles of neutralization" established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is to govern the later treaty. From this the deduction is drawn that the "general principle of neutralization" carries with it all the obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, including tolls and charges. A mere statement of this proposition ought to make clear its weakness. If the adoption of the general principle of neutralization carried with it all the obligations of the old treaty, there was no necessity for making the new, and the statement of the new treaty that it "shall supersede" the old is meaningless.

An argument is made on behalf of Great Britain based on the assumption that the term "general principle of neutralization" includes within its meaning traffic conditions. This is not justified. No such meaning ever has been or can now be given the word "neutralization." Its meaning in international law is simply immunity from attack. Referring to neutral territory, we mean that which is free from attack. Thus, Kent in his Commentaries said:

It is not lawful to make neutral territory the scene of hostility or to attack an enemy while within it.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist, said:

The rights of neutrality will only be respected when they are defended by an adequate power. A nation, despicable by its weakness, forfeits even the privilege of being neutral.

We undertook to make the canal as Kent understood it—that is, free from hostility and to prevent one hostile nation from attacking another within its zone. It was supposed that we were a Nation of adequate power so that we could compel respect, as Hamilton suggested, and not one of such despicable weakness as to be unable or unwilling to preserve and protect our rights.

The case of the opposition, in large part, rests upon two words in section 1, article 3, of the treaty. Those words are "all nations." It is confidently demanded, "Do not these words mean what they say—all nations? Does not that clearly include the United States?"

It ought to be clear that when the parties to a transaction consist on the one side of an individual nation which is binding itself to grant certain privileges to the other side, which other side consists of "all nations," which shall observe certain rules which the first party shall prescribe, that the words "all nations" means not itself, but all the other nations. Again, it is not alone "all nations," but "all nations observing these rules." It is not probable that the United States was making rules for itself and then pledging itself to be governed by its own rules. The fair, the reasonable, the apparent meaning of the section is that the United States will make and keep the canal open to all the nations which would observe the rules which it prescribed, and treat them all alike, and that whatever conditions or charges were imposed for its use should be just and equitable. Any other interpretation is forced, fanciful, and unreasonable. Any other meaning would be out of harmony with the other provisions of the treaty and not consonant with the conditions and circumstances under which it was made.

It is a very strong circumstance as indicative that this must be the true construction that the provisions of the act apply to vessels of war as well as vessels of commerce. The language is "vessels of commerce and of war." That is, vessels of war "of all nations" should be treated on terms of equality, and so forth. If vessels of commerce of all nations includes vessels of commerce of the United States, then vessels of war of all nations includes vessels of war of the United States. If other nations should pay tolls on their war vessels, so should the United States. That this was not intended must be apparent.

If the British contention is upheld, the United States could not use its own Navy in its own defense. It could not "revictual nor take any stores"; it could not remain in the Canal Zone longer than necessary to get through; it could not "disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike material" in the Canal Zone; it could not remain in the waters adjacent to the canal "longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible." If this interpretation is to be given the treaty, then we can not call the canal an American canal, for it is not.

It should be thoroughly understood that we can not yield to the interpretation by which the United States is included in the phrase "all nations" on the tolls question and not yield on all others that may be claimed. If we are within its meaning for one purpose, we are within its meaning for all purposes. That means nothing less than an absolute surrender of an American canal. That will make it what the committee calls it, an "international waterway," with regard to the control of which we shall have no more power than any other nation.

We have built the canal not primarily as a commercial investment. We built it as a protection to the life of the Nation; we built it to double the strength of our Navy; we built it to guard our coasts from invasion by a foreign foe. But if "all nations" are to have the same rights we have, then our contemplated advantage is gone. Our precaution, our protection, our defense is futile and vain. So that, yielding on tolls—which, as compared with this consideration, is as nothing—we yield that which might save the Nation's life. This is the tremendous issue involved.

Suppose the United States at war with Japan. England is its ally. We send the Atlantic Fleet through the canal to attack Japan. Great Britain sends its fleet across the Atlantic to help its ally. Shall it be allowed its fleet to use the canal to attack ours? And would we be compelled to furnish this fleet the same ammunition, supplies, and coal we furnished our own fleet?

All the provisions regarding blockading the canal and its use by vessels of war are consistent when applied to all other nations than the United States, but they are ridiculous when applied to the United States.

What is meant by equality of treatment? Any court would hold that it meant equality of treatment where conditions were equal. To the fullest extent, in the utmost particular that is what we have done. To all vessels engaged in the foreign trade, including our own vessels engaged in that trade, we charge the same tolls.

Every American ship which carries a cargo from any American port to any foreign port or from a foreign port to any American port must pay just exactly the same tolls and charges that are required of foreign vessels.

But with regard to our domestic commerce between American ports the conditions are not equal, for into that commerce no foreign ship is allowed to enter on any terms. From the first we have refused to allow a foreign ship to enter the coastwise trade.

Under the general terms of a treaty between nations it is the universal practice to interpret them as not applying to coastwise trade, which, it is understood, is a domestic matter governed by local law. In the treaty of 1815 between Great Britain and the United States it was provided that vessels of either in the ports of the other should pay no "higher or other duties or charges" than were imposed on vessels of the nation in which the port was situated. That treaty is still in effect. Yet an American vessel entering the port of Bristol, for instance, coming from an American port, pays 56 cents per ton port charges, while English vessels pay only 20 cents. The same policy is pursued in the United States. Foreign vessels pay 12 cents port charges, while American vessels pay nothing. Pilotage exemptions are likewise made to our domestic trade.

These latter exemptions were challengd in our courts in 1904, and the question as to whether the general terms of the treaty applied to coastwise vessels was finally passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States. The case is an important one, and ought to be determinative of the matter at issue. It is known as the Olsen against Smith case, and is reported in the One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Supreme Court Reports, page 344.

OLSEN AGAINST SMITH.

The treaty of 1815 contained a provision that—

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same port on British vessels.

Nothing was stated in connection with this provision as to whether it applied only to vessels engaged in the foreign trade or included also vessels engaged in the coastwise or domestic trade.

The action was brought by certain licensed pilots of Galveston, Tex., against certain unlicensed pilots for piloting a British vessel coming from a foreign port. The State law and the United States law exempted coastwise steam vessels from pilotage charges, but did not exempt vessels of the United States or foreign vessels engaged in the foreign trade from such charges. It was contended that because vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade were exempted from pilotage charges, while British vessels were compelled to pay such charges, that there was a violation of the treaty with Great Britain, which expressly provided that—no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same port by vessels of the United States.

In this case a higher charge was imposed on British vessels in a port of the United States than was imposed on vessels of the United States engaged in coastwise trade in the same port. If the general language of the treaty included our coastwise vessels, there was an undoubted violation of the treaty. Our Supreme Court held that they were not so included. The language is unequivocal and emphatic. Replying to that contention, the Supreme Court said:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in the foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

Referring to the logic of the contention, the court said:

In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in the foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

And that is exactly the logic, or, rather, want of logic, of the opposition's contention. They contend that because we have exempted our domestic commerce from tolls, although we charge our own vessels engaged in the foreign trade exactly the same as we charge foreign vessels, and although by law all foreign vessels are excluded entirely from our coastwise trade, nevertheless such exemption constitutes a violation of the treaty.

Our friends are fond of quoting that part of the treaty which provides for "entire equality." There can be no equality of any kind with regard to the coastwise traffic until the British are allowed to enter it, and under the decision of the Supreme Court there could be no discrimination against them until, being admitted to such commerce, vessels so admitted are charged tolls while vessels of the United States are exempted. As conditions exist now, in the language of the Supreme Court, it is "no concern" of Great Britain what we do with our coastwise trade.

That decision is, or ought to be, decisive of the present contention, for the language of the treaty of 1815 is stronger against an exemption of our coastwise trade than is the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. No amount of elimination and substitution can avoid the plain fact that the Supreme Court squarely held that when the word "vessels" is used without qualifying words in a treaty with a foreign power it can not be made to include vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from which foreign vessels are excluded.

The President urges that we must give up free tolls in order to put ourselves right before other nations.

But how are we to "put ourselves right"? There is only one way, and that is to demand our rights and never, under any circumstances, to surrender them either at the request or demand of other nations—our rights, not our claims. If we make claims which are not justified, we should abandon them whether requested to do so or not. But our rights we maintain at any cost, or else we will lose our own self-respect, as well as the respect of others.

In the President's view the tolls question is of minor importance. It can amount to only a couple of millions a year. It will not hurt us to give that up. But it is singular the President thinks that is all that is involved. "Right or wrong," we should give up, he says. But that is not a justifiable position. If there is a "right or wrong," if there is a principle involved, if we believe we are right, we must not give up, no matter how small the amount immediately involved. The English tax on tea was infinitesimal. It would not have harmed the Colonies to have paid it. But in that insignificant tax was involved the great principle for which the Colonies were struggling—that there should be no taxation without representation. And so, although they risked everything, although all the world wondered at their hardihood, they challenged the most powerful Empire on earth to a death struggle in support of what they believed right.

It may be the President sees dangers that cause him apprehension. It may be that his bungling diplomacy is causing him present embarrassment. But there is only one real danger, and that is national cowardice. We can maintain our place among the nations of the world even if we do blunder. But we can not maintain our place or command respect if we endeavor to purchase approval at the price of our national honor and integrity.

In the days of the Civil War, when our very existence hung trembling in the balance, we compelled England to abandon fitting out Confederate cruisers to harass our commerce, and we compelled France to abandon its project of erecting an empire in Mexico. We did this not by bluster, but by a quiet, dignified insistence on our rights as we understood them. There is nothing so compelling of respect as a firm adherence to our own policy. There is nothing that will so quickly bring imposition as a servile surrender to secure the approval of others.

If we surrender our views of what is right and what is best in this instance to please the President, how far will we be asked to go? If we begin to yield, how far shall we be pressed? What other concession will Great Britain or some other power ask if this be granted? To yield on this will only encourage further pressure. Are we to be asked to yield to Japan and Italy on immigration; to Spain and France, irritated because of our Mexican policy; to the Netherlands, because of its protest against our seamen's bill; to Germany, because of the tariff; to Russia, because of our denunciation of their treaty?

In our intercourse with other nations differences like these will constantly arise. Will it be a good, a wise, a safe policy to adopt—of surrender under pressure when we believe we are right?

It was President Cleveland who said in a much more critical case than the present:

There is no calamity a great nation can invite that equals a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

THE MORAL VIEWPOINT.

I have suggested some of the consequences that are likely to follow an admission of the correctness of the British contention. But there is still another consequence that will inevitably follow our surrender to the President's demand. By his own statement, all the world claims that by exempting our own domestic coastwise trade from tolls on our own canal we perpetrated a wrong; we consciously violated the plain terms of a solemn treaty; that deliberately and with set purpose to secure an unconscionable advantage we broke our agreement; that we were thereby guilty of a breach of faith, of common honesty, of our national honor.

To this charge we plead guilty if we yield to the President's demand. Are we willing to do this? Are we ready to confess to all the world that our action was not only mistaken, but cowardly, dastardly, contemptibly wrong? For a nation that endeavors to secure an advantage when in a position to hold its plunder and only yields when it finds it unsafe longer to keep its booty is not entitled to the decent respect of mankind.

I confess I am unable to understand the high moral quality of the President's position, so lavishly praised in the English journals.

In the first place, the President accepts the tolls exemption as the platform principle of his party, not only tacitly but by parading it and by asking the farmers to support his party and vote for him because carrying out such a policy would give them cheaper transportation rates. On that, with other pledges and promises, he succeeded in securing their support. Now, having won, he repudiates his platform, he violates his pledge to faithfully carry out its promises; he says that to grant free tolls to our domestic commerce is a mistaken policy, violates our treaty with Great Britain, is opposed by every foreign nation, and, whether right or wrong, we ought to give up to please and help him. If such action can be regarded as governed by high moral principles, we will have to revise our standards.

Let us examine its moral qualities from another standpoint. The canal act containing the tolls exemption was passed August 24, 1912. The date becomes important in determining as nearly as may be the time when the moral illumination occurred. The President's message was delivered March 5, 1914. Over a year and a half had elapsed before the President discovered the enormity of the act; over a year of service as President before he finds it to be his duty to secure a repeal of the obnoxious measure. In fact, not until he finds the country plunged into difficulties of "even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" by the blundering conduct of his own administration does he urge retreat. In other words, the President in his message contends we were wrong, contends we violated a treaty, contends we endeavored to secure an unjust advantage, admits that for over a year and a half we have held our wrongful position, and now only give it up because we think it safer to do so.

I do not believe we blundered. I do not believe we were mistaken in our rights. I do not believe that because we were big and strong we violated any treaty agreement, "right or wrong." I believe we acted fully within our rights. I believe we have fairly and honestly interpreted the treaty. I believe we have not only acted justly, but generously, to other nations in building the canal and opening it to the commerce of the world on such fair and equitable terms, and I believe that when the final verdict of history shall have been written our action will add glory and not shame to the Republic.

EVERY CITIZEN A STOCKHOLDER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, every citizen of the United States is a stockholder in the Panama Canal. Every citizen is represented by the Member of Congress from the district in which that citizen lives.

Every Representative in Congress must feel deeply his great responsibility in the enactment of this proposed repeal—a repeal which takes from American coast-to-coast ships that right to which they are entitled. Once gone, this right is gone forever. If wrong, it may not be righted. Therefore each Congressman, representing not only the 300,000 citizens of his district, but responsible as well to the whole American people, wants to do the right, and should not take kindly to presidential instructions which call for this measure, "right or wrong." Neither can the people of each district take kindly to such orders to their Representatives who, regardless of party—yes, and regardless even of platform pledge—desire in all international matters to uphold at all times the President of the United States, be he Democrat or Republican.

Further, if complications exist which lead any President in time of peace to say to the Congress, as President Wilson did say on the 5th day of this month:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

then the Representatives in Congress and the entire people of the United States are entitled to know something of those "other matters."

WHAT ARE THE DELICATE MATTERS?

That statement by President Wilson has set every person in the United States to wondering what diplomatic tangle is confronting us. Speculation runs wild in every newspaper and on every tongue. Do the "other matters of greater delicacy" deal with Great Britain? Do they concern Japan? Have they to do with the Anglo-Japanese treaty? Or do they refer to our uncertain and unfortunate policy with regard to Mexico? It has even been suggested in this debate that the loss of free tolls is the price we are to pay for the elimination of Huerta. Who believes any of these things? But who knows?

Important diplomatic questions and policies are very properly considered by the Senate in executive session until in the judgment of the President and Senate the subject is in form for public consideration.

But in this case the President asks the whole world to speculate as to world-wide intrigues. Only yesterday, Monday, March 30, Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS spoke, upholding the President and asserting that Japan might seize the Philippines and Hawaii and attack the Pacific coast, while Russia might seize Alaska, the United States being busy while this was going on in keeping Britain, France, and Germany out of Mexico.

FEARS OF DISTINGUISHED SENATOR.

I quote from a newspaper report of Senator LEWIS's speech:

> That Russia would seize Alaska and Japan the Philippines and Hawaii, besides attacking the Pacific coast, while the United States was trying to prevent the occupation of Mexico by England, Germany, and France, was the danger which Senator LEWIS, on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, said he believed to be the guiding motive behind the request of the President for the repeal of the free-tolls provision.
> "Fourteen times in our history has our mere word been enough to bring order out of chaos in Mexico," declared Senator LEWIS. "But now what is the condition? Suppose that at length England, Germany, and France should attempt to protect their property there, denying this right to the United States even should we be willing to enter that distressed country. We might say to them, 'Stand back; we have a doctrine known as the Monroe doctrine, which means America for the Americans.' They will say to us that we are too late; that in invading China in aiding the construction of a railroad there, in placing our flag over Hawaii and the Philippines, we have made a world Nation of this country and can not longer hold the world from entering America.
> "Then, when we would be forced to move our armies into Mexico, which there is little doubt public sentiment would force us to do, what would happen? Japan, long with a grievance that we have discriminated against her citizens in California, and are even now seeking to discriminate against them in our pending immigration bill, would seize the Philippines and Hawaii. Members in this body from the Pacific Coast States have shown their fear of what further might happen by their demands for the fortification of Pacific ports and the strengthening of the Army in the West. Russia, which at present has not even a treaty with this country, but which has an offensive and defensive alliance with its one-time enemy, Japan, would seize Alaska.
> "All of the South American countries, remembering our operation upon Colombia, by which we obtained Panama, and wondering which will be the next victim, will lend us little aid."

I make no comment on the predictions or fears of the Senator. It is a sample of the speculation that fills the country.

WHY ARE LEADERS UNINFORMED?

Ah, Mr. Speaker, can it be that the trusted leaders of the Democratic Party were not taken into the President's confidence? Or, if they were—and it certainly would seem that they should have been—they appear not to have been impressed with the "matter of even greater delicacy," for we find all of the leaders—UNDERWOOD, CLARK, KITCHIN, DOREMUS, and FITZGERALD—opposing the President and standing firmly against the un-American doctrine which gives a decided advantage to that proud mistress of the seas, Great Britain.

The Democratic leaders are supported by the Republican leader, JAMES R. MANN, and the Progressive leader, VICTOR MURDOCK. All of these men are experienced, tried, and true. All could have been trusted with the great secret, if that secret was of such portend that all Members of Congress should not have had the information. Speaker CHAMP CLARK has been designated as America's finest example of "homespun" American. And he is. I honor him for his Americanism, pure and undefiled.

Numerous addresses of Hon. JAMES R. MANN in this House recently, as well as his inspiring speech to-day, made his intense and earnest patriotism stand out. For clear-headedness and coolness Leader MANN can be depended upon. His arguments this afternoon in this debate are unanswerable.

I have no doubt but that after this battle is over the charge will be made that the leaders—CLARK and UNDERWOOD, at least—had knowledge from the White House as to the "delicate situation." I shall always believe, when the real secret is out, that if they were given advance information they were not impressed, for neither they nor the other leaders would put personal ambition or party prestige ahead of this Nation's necessity. In fact, the Democratic leaders have destroyed the solidarity of their party, for which all of them were striving, with promises of an era of good feeling.

BLACK PAGE IN UNITED STATES HISTORY.

But hope of that era is gone. There bids fair to be written on the page of American history for 1914 one line for which America will be forever ashamed. That line of unwarranted concession to Great Britain will stand out black against lines telling of the presidential achievements of the year.

All of these leaders who have taken a stand against the President of the United States in this, his urgent and unusual appeal, agree as to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. All agree that the proposed repeal is un-American and not necessary for the upholding of the national honor. All agree on the construction of section 8.

HISTORY AND THE SUEZ CANAL.

One Member of Congress with long experience here, Hon. JULIUS KAHN, who has given great study to this question, asks, "What would Great Britain do in like circumstances?" History gives us the answer. Read the accounts of British "astuteness" in dealing with the Suez Canal question in 1882, during the revolt of Arabi Pasha against his sovereign. This Islamite recognized the neutrality of the Suez, although urged to seize it for strategic purposes. But England, when it suited her purpose, promptly took possession of the Suez Canal. She refused all vessels, even those of the canal company, the right to enter or leave that waterway, and placed a gunboat at its mouth.

In addition to all I have said, I will add later, as an appendix to this speech, 10 reasons why Congress should not yield our Panama Canal at British behest.

But if I had not reached a conclusion based on these reasons, and if I did not have an overpowering conviction that the proposed repeal is fraught with disaster of far-reaching extent, I would still have two other reasons, also, which would justify me in voting to retain free tolls for American vessels engaged in coast-to-coast trade, and these are:

First. Learning that the Canadian Pacific Railroad and the transcontinental railroads of the United States favored tolls for American ships, I would be for free tolls.

Second. Learning that Andrew Carnegie's association had sent out hundreds of thousands of documents favoring the repeal of the free-tolls clause, then I would be against it. I do not like the Carnegie methods of influencing the Government of the United States—either past or present.

AGAINST MYSTERY; AGAINST SECRECY; AGAINST CLOTURE.

This is an era of publicity. The days of invisible government are gone. The days of the secret caucus are passing. The days of gag rules in Congress are over—in spite of the fact that a gag rule was forced upon us for this debate, limiting this discussion and absolutely precluding amendment to the bill under consideration. The people of the United States are on record against cloture of this kind. The United States is tired of secrecy, and as the United States has never had much success with secret diplomatic intrigues, and were warned by George Washington against international meddling, I know full well that the people will not take kindly to the secret and mysterious methods which have led to Executive dictation by which Congress is called on to give ungrudgingly this concession to Great Britain. It may be given, but not ungrudgingly, as this debate has already shown.

And further, these words from the Declaration of Independence, adopted and proclaimed July 4, 1776, are just as true to-day as they were on that day:

> He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation.

FROM PACIFIC COAST VIEWPOINT.

Mr. Speaker, in arriving at my determination to vote against the repeal, I have omitted looking at the situation from a Pacific coast viewpoint. However, in fairness and justice to the sturdy population of that coast, who have carried too long the heavy burden of excessive freight rates, I must state that the repeal of free tolls will be an awful blow to them. What is more, that blow will be felt by the people of the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys. The statement has been made on this floor that free tolls would bring no benefit to the people of central United States. I disagree with that statement.

That our lumber industry, already hit by a tariff, must further suffer I propose to show.

HOQUIAM, WASH., March 5, 1914.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON,
United States Representative, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Within please find copy of contribution to the Outlook, written by Mr. James C. Chadwick, of Omaha, Nebr. Mr. Chadwick is a retired merchant and formerly was a big shipper located in New York City and is well qualified to speak.

About a week ago we asked a foreign lumber buyer for Balfour-Guthrie & Co., of Portland, Oreg., what would be the probable rates on lumber from British Columbia to New York through the Panama Canal. He stated that at the present rate of freight it would be about $7 per thousand feet. The lowest freight rate that we have been promised in American bottoms through the canal is $13, leaving a difference in favor of Canadian lumber of $6 per thousand feet in freight rate alone, and even if we should get a small reduction in freight rate we will never be able to successfully compete with that competition.

Therefore the present law admitting coastwise shipping in American bottoms through the canal free of toll should stand unless at the same time our laws be so changed that we be allowed to ship from coast to coast in foreign ships. Aside from the treaty situation, we are inclined to agree with Mr. Chadwick that no toll for American ships is not right, but it is much less right to give the British Columbia shippers such an advantage over us that they will practically control the lumber trade of the Atlantic Coast States to the detriment and exclusion of American product. In other words, it is a proposition to turn our own home trade over to a foreign nation. British Columbia is allowed to ship lumber into South Africa free of duty, which we think is perfectly right with the two countries being under English dominion, but why should we give them the advantage in shipping into our own country when we have to pay duty shipping into South Africa?

The foreign ship will also have great advantage over the American in carrying lumber from here to the Atlantic coast, as they can then accept a cargo from there to any part of the world, whereas the American ship will practically be forced to come back again to this coast whether she can get a cargo or not, as they will not be prepared or equipped to enter the foreign trade. The reason for this we think is well understood, considering the original cost of investment and then the additional cost of operation.

We hope that you will see that this matter is brought to the attention of the President so that he may be able to do justice to the American people as well as he is now trying to be just and fair to the English Nation, even though it may be at the expense of our own people. This is a matter of very great importance to the Pacific coast, but we believe it is of much greater importance to the Southern States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, as the British Columbia lumber will no doubt utterly ruin their trade along the Atlantic coast.

It may take a little time for the American operator to get into British Columbia and produce this lumber, but if the laws are left as at present we can assure you it will not take very long. We believe you will find the southern yellow-pine manufacturer will be hurt far more by this unfair competition than we will on the Pacific coast.

Yours, very truly,

GRAYS HARBOR LUMBER CO.,
By N. J. BLAGEN.

The letter referred to by Mr. Blagen is as follows:

OMAHA, NEBR., February 26, 1914.

The OUTLOOK, New York:

I have read the "Parable"—Outlook, February 21—and know your views on the Panama Canal tolls, as commented upon since the enactment of the canal-tolls law.

I take the liberty of submitting a clipping from the Daily News, of Omaha, quoting Col. Goethals on this subject:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23.

"Col. Goethals to-day told Chairman ADAMSON, of the House Interstate Commerce Committee:

"'We have spent $400,000,000 on the canal and we ought to make the canal pay back this cost. American vessels should bear this burden as well as foreign ships.'

"For work next year he estimates that $23,770,000 will be needed, as compared with $16,000,000 this year. Balboa railroad extensions, dock yards, a breakwater, collieries, and shipping and railroad shops are needed and considerable dredging and blasting must be done."

I take the same ground as that quoted above—that all users of the canal should pay full toll regardless of any treaty. Even if there were no treaty, the use of the canal by United States coastwise trading vessels of all class should pay, on the basis of simple equity to the non-shipping class, who as well as the shipowners bear their portion of the burden of cost of the canal.

Why should 99 per cent of the population of this country confer upon the small percentage of population this profit of toll? The justice in the case, as I view it, is that every man should pay for what he gets, and as a right to the whole those who are engaged in shipping business should without favor pay for the use of the canal built by this Government.

Why is it that coast shipping, as it now stands, in the hands of so small percentage of the country, should have the special privilege of right to all the shipping, when the country at large would be so greatly benefited through giving all shippers the right to ship in vessels or ships of any flag, through which untold benefits would accrue to the country as against the old-time rule of American coast ships for American-built ships only?

I have talked with men of large interests on the Pacific coast, and know how badly they will be handicapped soon after the opening of the Panama Canal, especially the lumber interests, who will have to compete with British Columbia and the American pirates who hurried to the Canadian northwest to secure large tracts of timber, where they will have such an advantage over the lumber dealers of the United States Pacific coast through their cheaper shipping cost, and no interest to pay on uncut land, that it will mean almost the putting out of business the American lumber merchants.

All that these large legitimate interests ask is an even chance with their competitors to ship in vessels of any nation. By repealing the old shipping law and throwing this carrying business open to competition of the world will hurt a few, but I claim it is the right and just thing to do.

The trouble in our country is that all business has been so accustomed to special privilege that it is most difficult for our legislators to be broadly patriotic and legislate for the benefit of the whole instead of a special class.

Yours, truly,

JAMES C. CHADWICK.

The argument of Mr. Chadwick, in the article in The Outlook, is the argument of many Democrats on this floor—that coast-to-coast ships doing business for profit should not go free at the expense of the whole population, which must pay for the canal. But that is an internal question and can be settled if we do not vote our rights away. Besides, the United States is not quite ready to give up entirely its flag on the sea. That is what "giving all shippers the right to ship in vessels of any flag" would mean.

HOW MANY BLOWS AT PACIFIC COAST?

How many knock-out blows is the Pacific coast expected to stand?

This repeal is, of course, the greatest one, and it comes before the coast has recovered from having been hit a staggering blow by the new tariff bill. All of the industries of the coast, from the citrus fruits of California to the wool of Oregon, to the lumber, fish, dairy products, and wheat of Washington have been thrown into deadly competition with foreign-made and foreign-grown products.

The north boundary of my great State, which is the boundary of the Nation, has been wiped out commercially. Canada has received all of the benefits of reciprocity without the reciprocity. Our northern neighbors chuckle when they think of their wisdom in voting down the reciprocity scheme.

But, in addition to free trade and further unfair competition with British Columbia, to be brought about by this repeal of free tolls, it looks as if we are about to be dealt still another. I refer to the proposed international fisheries treaty, the bill making which effective came so near being passed by unanimous consent in this House the other day.

As if three hard blows at the Pacific coast in one year of one administration were not enough, there is still another. For long we have been promised complete Asiatic-exclusion legislation. We were promised that if we would not insist on loading that proposition onto the Burnett immigration bill, we might have an Asiatic-exclusion measure considered. But diplomatic relations got in the way. All we of the Pacific coast can hope for now is a bill excluding the poor, decrepit Hindu, who has been fleeced of his means at home, and who is being kicked off of every one of the possessions of the British Crown, until the wretched outcast has literally no place to lay his head, except the Philippines or the United States. Even Mexico does not want him, although that ill-starred Republic can find room for the Japanese.

No wonder the people of the Pacific coast demand to know something about the "delicate situation" before they bid their chosen congressional Representatives to give up ungrudgingly, right or wrong, free tolls for American ships from their ports to ports on the Atlantic.

If the "delicate situation" is Mexico, they do not care. That butchery has gone beyond the delicate-situation stage. The choking off of Mexican credit in order to crush one set of villainous usurpers while at the same time delivering American-made arms and ammunition to another set of tenth-century bandits does not appeal to the western sense of fair play. Neither does it call for much encouragement of the modern form of American diplomacy, nor is it the western conception of the Andrew Carnegie peace scheme.

If the delicate situation is with Great Britain, the pioneers of the Pacific remember the cry "Fifty-four-forty or fight." They remember that, in spite of that defiant cry, it was with much difficulty that their boundary was extended north of the Columbia River, and that Oregon, Washington, and Idaho were saved to the United States, the only part of what is now the United States over which only one flag has ever flown—the Stars and Stripes.

Is history repeating itself?

War with Mexico and the opportunity to annex Texas caused President James K. Polk to drop his stirring campaign cry,

"Fifty-four-forty or fight." Can it be that the present Mexican situation is causing President Woodrow Wilson to drop the firm statements of his Washington Park, N. J., ante-election speech and to give up control of the canal and sovereignty over the territory through which it has been cut?

WHY BEAR THE BURDEN?

If we must give up control and give up any advantages that might accrue to our coast-to-coast ships and our people, why not give up the load of interest-bearing indebtedness which we have incurred and ask the first-power nations of the world to assume that indebtedness, share and share alike? Every economic advantage having been deliberately bartered away to conciliate foreign interest, the canal might as well be thrown in. Repugnant as that suggestion is, it is less so than the one we are called upon to ratify, right or wrong.

The people of the Pacific coast are for peace—peace with honor—but every thinking person on that coast knows that on the broad Pacific, sooner or later, Mongol and Caucasian must meet—meet for the first time since they met on the plains of Ararat centuries ago—and engage in mortal combat; in final conflict for racial supremacy.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, there is something about the passage of this bill that is not right. It seems to interfere with our national prerogative, and bears with it an element of mystery. In national affairs, as in individual affairs, we must so use our own as not to injure others, but I fail to see how Great Britain is injured by the use we make of the Panama Canal in the shipment of our coastwise trade. England is already prohibited from engaging in this coastwise carrying trade, and no foreign ship, under the present law, has any right to receive in one American port merchandise and unload it at another; so that neither Great Britain nor any other nation is concerned with our coastwise traffic. They lose nothing and gain nothing whether this merchandise and traffic goes through the Panama Canal free or not.

It is not contended that England will be injured by giving free tolls to our coastwise trade, and whether or not she is complaining is problematic. There has not been put into the record any formal protest made by Great Britain. Many innuendoes and statements have been made by the speakers on the floor of the House that she is complaining, but they all add to the mystery of the situation when we look for the complaint and ground for complaint. I am here constrained to inquire and ask the question: Is she complaining? When did she complain? To whom did she complain? and What are the expressed terms of her complaint?

We are forbidden by the laws of England to engage in her coastwise trade, and while it seems ridiculous that we should even if permitted engage in coastwise trade in Great Britain—operate with our meager merchant marine—still the statement shows that we are not preventing England from doing anything in this regard which under the law she permits us to do. Certainly England can not complain of our prohibiting her from engaging in our coastwise trade when she prohibits us from engaging in hers, and I make this statement to show the justice of our position.

TREATY RIGHTS.

As to whether we are violating our treaty rights is open to serious question even from the standpoint of those who wish to levy tolls through the canal upon our coastwise trade. We have the assurance of two ex-Presidents that it is not a violation of our treaty obligations, and I here incorporate their views as published in the Washington Post on March 26, 1914:

COL. ROOSEVELT'S VIEWS.

I believe that the position of the United States as to the Panama Canal is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation. No ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is to the Canadian Pacific Railway. * * * We are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find such great and expensive work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation, but by a nation, as generously put at the service of all mankind.

FROM MR. TAFT'S MESSAGE.

In his message of August 18, 1912, written after receipt of the first formal British protest against tolls exemption, after the passage of the bill by the House of Representatives, Mr. Taft said:

"After full examination of the treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

"I am sure that it is not the intention of Congress to violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or to enact anything inconsistent with its provisions, and that it certainly is not its purpose to repeal, by subsequent enactment, the treaty in so far as it represents the law of the land."

On Tuesday at New Haven Mr. Taft said he had "seen no reason" to change the views then expressed.

Before election President Wilson made campaign speeches advocating free tolls for our coastwise shipping.

To corroborate this great authority there was incorporated in the Democratic platform of 1912 the following plank:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

May we also add to the position that our treaty rights are not violated by giving free tolls to our coastwise shipping. We quote the following statement found in the November number of the London Law Review for 1912, when the law exempting tolls was being considered in the House previous to its passage:

(a) That the United States can support its action—that is, providing for exemption for the coastwise vessels—on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on ground of general justice;

(b) There is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process of arbitration; and

(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

There is no higher legal authority in England than this Law Review:

In submitting this treaty to the Senate Mr. Hay, who drafted the treaty, said:

"The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it."

And as to American responsibility:

"The United States alone, as the sole owner of the canal, as a purely American enterprise, adopts and prescribes the rules by which the use of the canal shall be regulated, and assumes the entire responsibility and burden of enforcing, without the resistance of Great Britain or of any other nation, its absolute neutrality."

It is stated that—

The British under secretary of foreign affairs, in a letter written in 1912 to Secretary of State Knox, is quoted as follows:

"If the trade should be so regulated as to make certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which was reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

Great Britain, Germany, France, or other great powers would not discuss for a moment the claim of any power to hold a treaty right to demand that tolls be placed upon their coastwise trade in the waterways they own, control, or have built.

In construing the Texas pilot law Chief Justice White, of the United States Supreme Court, held:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

The syllabus of the rule announced by the Supreme Court in this case reads as follows:

"A State pilotage law subjecting all vessels, domestic and foreign, engaged in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, but which exempts pursuant to law coastwise steam vessels of the United States, is not in conflict with provisions in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain to the effect that British vessels shall not be subject to any higher or other charges than vessels of the United States."

In short, the Supreme Court held that the regulation of coastwise commerce did not "concern vessels in the foreign trade."

And this authority is not now and never has been questioned.

Further high authority in our own country is not wanting. To the repeal of this law is opposed Hon. CHAMP CLARK, the great leader of the American Congress; Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, close student and of long service in Congress, a premier Democrat; Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD, economic student and parliamentarian, of Brooklyn, and Senator O'GORMAN, leader of the bar of New York City, both pronounced Democrats; and Hon. JAMES R. MANN, Republican leader of the minority in the present Congress, all are against the repeal of the law, and not only base their action upon the fact that it does not violate the treaty, but also because the repeal would affect the sovereignty of our Republic, the greatest nation on the globe. Does anyone think for a moment that this great array of lawmakers would violate their oath in their attitude on this question, or does anyone think that we are not observant of the great law of nations? And, if it were wrong to enforce this treaty, they would not hesitate to be against it.

WHO IS INTERESTED?

It does not take much of a stretch of imagination to see at a glance who are interested in the repeal of this law for free tolls, and one only needs to look at the great Canadian Pacific and transcontinental railways. The purpose of enacting this law was to make competition between the railroads, these common carriers and merchant marines in American transportation; and this purpose is expressed in the platform of the Democratic Party of 1912 in these words:

We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned by railway carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

This plank has already been enacted into law. Do you intend to repeal this provision and turn our coastwise shipping over to the great transportation lines of our country?

The French built the great Suez Canal. It has since been gobbled up and is now owned by England. The Panama Canal was not built for England. England owns a majority of the stock of the Suez Canal. The cost of the Suez Canal up to the end of 1910 amounted to $126,642,406. The tolls charged on the Suez Canal are $1.30 per net ton. The net profits of the Suez Canal for 1910 were $15,908,419, and paid a profit of 31 per cent to its stockholders. Under the present law we charge $1.20 a ton for merchandise going through the Panama Canal. Our canal cost $375,000,000, as compared with $127,000,000 for the Suez Canal. Our ships will pass through the Panama Canal in less than 12 hours, while it requires 17 hours to pass through the Suez Canal. The depth of the Suez Canal is 28 feet, as compared with 41 feet depth of the Panama Canal.

Bonds to the amount of $138,631,981 have been issued toward the payment for the construction of the Panama Canal, $84,000,000 of which bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent, while the balance will pay interest at the rate of 3 per cent. The estimate of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, statistician and expert in shipping, is that 10,500,000 tons would pass through the canal in the year 1915, of which but 1,160,000 net tons would be our coastwise traffic. This would leave 9,340,000 net tons of traffic on which tolls will be collected, and at the rate of $1.20 per net ton, the charge now fixed by law, the revenue for the year 1915 will amount to $11,208,000, which will allow $4,000,000 for the cost, operation, and maintenance of the canal, and $7,000,000 to apply on interest charges, which will quite equal the interest on the bonds.

From the foregoing, taken from carefully compiled statistics and the most reliable information, is it not patent to the most casual observer that England is getting much better treatment in the use of the Panama Canal than we are receiving in the use of the Suez Canal?

WARSHIPS.

The particular clause of the treaty which it is claimed we violate is section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, entered into on the 18th day of November, 1901, and reads as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

From the foregoing it will be observed that our vessels of war are placed side by side with our vessels of commerce, and if by this provision all nations are to have the same rights in the canal to operate their ships of commerce, and we are bound by the same rule—that is, having no greater right or privilege than any other nation in our ships of trade—then the same rule must apply to our warships, and we must either let all warships have free passage or must charge all warships, including our own, in going through this canal. It is contended in time of war our treaty with a belligerent nation would be abrogated, which, even if true, would not change the situation in times of peace, so that if our own war vessels are permitted to go through the canal free of toll, by every reasoning used by the proponents of this bill we must let other warships through free of toll, which, I am sure, was not the purpose in the construction of the canal or the understanding of the great intelligence of our citizenship in its undertaking.

The construction of the canal and the greatest need of the canal was in the furtherance of a great war measure. By it we double our fleet and the utility and power of our warships. To say that at the enormous cost we should build this great canal, the greatest of the world's engineering feats, a most stupendous undertaking, to in the end be dictated, controlled, and turned over to England to operate, forsooth, as it does the Suez Canal, arouses the shades of our Revolutionary fathers and submerges our independence as a free and enlightened Nation.

We have heard much during this debate about national honor. No party has a premium on that. We all stand for our national honor and our flag, forever to maintain, never to disparage or surrender. Indeed, we pride ourselves as a Nation on our generosity and the civilization of our people, but whoever thought or knew that it extended to that degree where we would build this great canal at such cost of treasure, and when we come to use it permit outsiders to say we could not do so without violating our national honor?

In the interest of humanity we invaded China, we took over the Philippines, we established an independent Government in Cuba, but now if we surrender this right in the canal, we put a stain on our supremacy and national honor already dimmed by the dark pages of history now being written in Mexico.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, the question before us is not whether we are going to charge our domestic ships, known as coastwise vessels, tolls, but whether we intend to surrender for all time the right to control the canal both in time of peace and in time of war.

If the construction placed upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by President Wilson is true, Secretary Hay must have broken it two years afterwards in the treaty which he entered into with Panama, known as the Hay-Buneau Varilla treaty, which gives our country the right to fortify the canal and the vessels of the Panama Government the right of free transportation through the canal. Must it not be a fact that Secretary Hay knew exactly what the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was intended to accomplish and the rights of both countries when he made this treaty with Panama?

It does not seem possible that any country could expect us to follow the lines laid down in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in time of war, and yet, if we recognize the contentions in regard to the tolls, we must surely agree to the remaining part of the treaty, which would mean the neutralization of the canal and its use by a hostile fleet under the protection of the United States, and the passage of this fleet through the canal if it so desired.

There never has been a treaty made between this country and Great Britain which has not recognized that our domestic commerce was not open to foreign vessels. All treaties, without even mentioning it, have recognized this fact, as in none of the treaties is it excepted. So why should there be an exception made in the case of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Almost every country trading extensively with other nations has reserved by statutes its coastwise trade for its own ships. In many of our treaties with foreign nations this fact is mentioned. Among these are Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Greece, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Norway, and Japan, the last, however, permitting trading between what are called "open ports." It seems to be a recognized fact that this trade belongs to the people of the countries bordering at the seas, and they are jealous of any other shipping entering into it.

For this repeal Great Britain could well afford to pay this country three or four million dollars annually, as it will mean far more to her shipping interests than that amount of money, and would prevent, by this indirect subsidy the building of an American merchant marine which will eventually reach out into other fields than our coastwise traffic and may prove a formidable competitor to her in other markets.

Canada directly will be the principal beneficiary of this repeal. It has been stated that Canada has been fair with us in connection with the Welland Canal. While this may be true, does not our country reciprocate at the Soo, in the St. Clair River, and on Lake Michigan? Has Canada ever dealt fairly with us? It subsidizes lines to Jamaica and South Africa, and the terms of those subsidies are that these ships shall not stop at ports of the United States, not even to purchase coal. Another one of the terms of these subsidies is that the ships receiving it shall give preference to Canadian shippers and Canadian-made goods.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty calls for entire equality. How many different constructions may be put upon this term. About 25 per cent of the tolls of the Suez Canal are paid as an extra subsidy by the Governments of countries running lines through the canal. It is to be presumed that these Governments will do the same in the use of the Panama Canal, therefore placing the countries that do not pay the subsidies at a disadvantage. Will the ships of these Governments that pay regular subsidies be upon entire equality with those who do not?

It seems to me that the only thing for us to do is to assert positively our control of the canal, so that it can be run in a business manner, retaining the right to meet conditions, to preserve entire fairness between the countries using it, and make the benefit to the world we hoped it would be when we were constructing it. Without this control conditions would become intolerable and fairness a farce.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, the repeal of the provision of the Panama Canal act which exempts our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls may be considered from two standpoints—economic and contractual. Such repeal is economically sound, and the provision as it now stands a grave error from an economic standpoint and entirely antagonistic to Democratic doctrine.

So insidious and deceptive in form does this doctrine of protection constantly present itself, that even those of us who have fought it in season and out of season for so many years, until now, at last, when crowned with victory, we do not at first recognize the hydraheaded monster when it presents itself in the new guise of a friend to our merchant marine. I acknowledge I failed to do so when the Panama Canal act was passed, but I quickly discovered my error and urged the President to veto the bill. There is no better friend of the merchant marine on the floor of this House than I am, and no one will go further to foster, develop, and encourage it than I will; but I am utterly opposed to indirectly indorsing the protection theory under the fallacious plea that the canal is ours, constructed by us where others failed, paid for by our money, and that we may use it for our own benefit as we like. True it is that the canal is the product of American genius, skill, enterprise, and money, but the genius, skill, and enterprise were secured by the money of the people—the money of all the people, not exclusively the money of the owners of the vessels plying the coastwise trade. Does any man on this floor believe that by sending the coastwise vessels through the canal free of tolls that the people will benefit one penny in the reduction of freight charges? No. It is the same old protection doctrine of benefiting favored classes under the theory that they are the disbursers of such benefit among the body politic. The people have been fooled by this doctrine long enough. They have called a halt. You can not fool all the people all the time, as the immortal Lincoln said. Suppose it was proposed that some municipality owning its own waterworks or gas works should be asked by some particular class of its citizens to furnish water and gas free, without any cost, on the ground that such class was a deserving portion of the community engaged in business which afforded desired public facilities, but needed encouragement and preferential advantages, in order that it might grow and prosper. Would any sane representative body entertain such a proposition? Is not this an entirely parallel case?

The Panama Canal, though owned by the people, is not a part of the Government. It is an entity separate and distinct from the Government; a creation of tangible income-producing property; an investment which should produce a reasonable return on the outlay, seeking the patronage of the world on equal terms; an altruistic monopoly devoted to the general welfare of humanity in advancing civilization through facilitating commerce, without seeking preferential benefit.

From an economic standpoint, to allow this provision of free tolls to remain on our statute books as a law approved by the Democratic Party is, in my opinion, a reflection upon our intelligence, and I trust that the repeal will be ordered by such an overwhelming vote as to convince the country that we have the manliness and courage as a party to acknowledge the error made in our party platform when second thought convinces us an error has been made. In the Fifty-sixth Congress, when the subject of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal was under consideration, I urged delay until our merchant marine was in a fair way to compete with the world. My idea was we should allow other nations to participate in its construction, but that we should have preferential advantages if we undertook the construction on our own account. We, however, assumed a much higher plane than any selfish interest.

Even so great an expounder of the principles of the opposing party as the senior Senator from my State apologizes for the passage of this provision of the law, saying:

> That when that provision was adopted the Members of both Houses were much exhausted; our minds were not working with their full vigor; we were weary, physically and mentally.

I confess it is beyond my comprehension to understand how any intelligent man with an open mind who will read the really great speech of Senator ROOT, delivered in the Senate January 21, 1913, can come to any other conclusion but that we are in honor bound to repeal the free-tolls provisions of the Panama Canal act.

It is shown by indisputable facts and officials papers—

That the civilized world looks with amazement upon any suggestion, even, that this great nation has any desire to retain a special advantage for itself when its pledged word has gone forth that it would not do so;

That the two great powers in possession of the American Continent north of the Rio Grande just prior to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were the United States and Great Britain, and that the latter was in possession of the eastern end of what was considered the most desirable route for an Isthmian canal;

That the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was sought by the United States, and that the treaty was made by Great Britain as a concession to our urgent demands to give us an equal participation in the control and protection of a canal across the Isthmus, it being agreed that neither Government should "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the ship canal";

That under this treaty Great Britain surrendered preferential rights it had previously acquired and we surrendered nothing, and gave nothing except our promise to assume equality with Great Britain for "the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of constructing and maintaining the canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same";

That the expressed purpose of the treaty was to establish a general principle for the protection of any means of interoceanic communication across the Isthmus, it being—

> Always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve as just and equitable—> that the same canal or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall always be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State. * * *

That under similar conditions Canada, having at one time attempted to give her citizens preferential advantages over our citizens in the use of her canals by a system of rebates, being under obligations under the treaty of Washington of 1871 to accord equal terms to us, was promptly "called down" by President Cleveland and gracefully retired from the untenable position she had taken.

The words then used by that great President are equally applicable to the present case, to wit:

> To promise equality and then in practice make it conditional is to fulfill a promise with the shadow of performance.

Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and previous thereto, as shown, the United States had no desire or authority to construct for its own account any interoceanic canal through the Isthmus of Panama. As time elapsed and our development and growth continued at a pace amazing both to ourselves and the civilized world, the desirability of a water connection between our two shores becoming more and more apparent, and we being prohibited by the existing treaty from undertaking the project alone, we made, in the words of Secretary Olney—

> A direct and straightforward application to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter.

This application resulted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under this treaty, securing the right of construction and supervision, we renewed and confirmed our previous position as to the general principle of neutralization involved in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and specifically agreed to certain rules adopted by us as the basis of such neutralization. Section 1 of article 3 reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discriminations against any such nations or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Again, by the treaty with the Republic of Panama, November 18, 1903, which granted us the use, supervision, and control of the zone of land to be occupied by the canal, we reaffirmed and specifically ratified this section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Under these facts, in the words of Senator Davis—

> To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States, even if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the greatest factor of human happiness is unselfishness. The man in any community beloved best of his neighbors is the man who is not continuously putting himself forward and clamoring for something for his personal advantage and benefit—the man who does a kind act for some one else, especially if it should involve some self-sacrifice. In the words of the psalmist, "He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

The monopolistic tendency of recent years, resulting in great combinations for selfish ends, has produced a revulsion in sentiment toward vested rights and is leading toward demoralized communism. We can not afford to have this great Nation the exemplar of this tendency. As the immortal Jefferson wrote, "A decent respect to the opinions of mankind" forbids. Besides this, no matter if our selfish propensities would lead us to assert rights to which we are not entitled in defiance of the "opinions of mankind," we are not so lost to a sense of honor as to break our plighted word. The good faith of the Nation is pledged that the canal shall be free to all alike, and that we will seek no selfish advantage therefrom.

Mr. Speaker, I say in all earnestness that I would rather vote to charter a ship to be loaded with dynamite and send it charged with the duty to blow the Gatun Dam to atoms, that the canal might exist in memory only, than have our good name sullied with the dishonor which would come to us by refusing to pass this bill.

Incidentally it may be mentioned, if selfish material interests are to be considered, that our trade relations with England and her possessions constitute by far the most important part of our foreign commerce.

The figures for the calendar year ending 1913 are as follows:

Total exports to England and her possessions	$1,099,261,661
Total imports from England and her possessions	564,865,920
Showing a trade balance in our favor of	534,395,741

It may be added that the exports to England and her possessions during the year 1913 constituted 44¼ per cent of the whole.

A Representative from the great and glorious State of California comes and tells us that in carrying out an agreement entered into with Great Britain we are selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. O tempora! O mores!

When the Senate had under consideration the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Senator Bard from this same State of California moved an amendment by adding a clause in these words:

> The United States reserves the right * * * to discriminate in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade.

And, Mr. Speaker, the Senate declined to adopt the amendment, voting it down. Could there be any plainer proof possible than this action that we did not then consider the treaty gave such right? Our birthright, Mr. Speaker, is our national honor, and if we should sacrifice this for the attempted enforcement of a supposed material advantage to which we are clearly not entitled, we would, indeed, be selling this priceless jewel for a mess of pottage.

President Wilson, in asking us to repeal this toll-exemption clause, is asking only that we do what we agreed to do, only that we keep faith. The tolls provision was an afterthought, and a very discreditable and dishonest afterthought. To retreat from an act violating an international agreement is only a matter of simple honesty; to do otherwise would be dishonest and dishonorable.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under discussion, which seeks to repeal that feature of the Panama Canal act which exempts from tolls American ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, was considered in the Sixty-second Congress, and it was then decided that this Government has the right to discriminate in favor of its own coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal.

This attitude, so firmly expressed by that Congress, was as firmly maintained by the platform declarations of two parties, one of which is at present in control of the entire Government of the United States. When the Democratic Party at Baltimore laid down the proposition in favor of the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal it hardly expected that the day was not far distant when it would be seriously called upon to repudiate that doctrine. That day has already arrived, and we are confronted with the humiliating spectacle of a party's determination now to abandon a policy to which it was but recently committed.

The reasons now advanced for repeal are precisely the reasons that were offered in opposition to the doctrine of exemption when the problem was formerly discussed. No new ideas are presented. We are simply importuned to concede the contention of Great Britain, without even raising the question as to whether we were right or wrong.

It is apparently easy for some folks to do this. Of course their justification will be that they took the cue from one who spoke with authority on the question. The judgment of their constituencies will have no bearing upon them. When asked to explain their action, the answer that the President of the United States recommended it may prove to be a sufficient defense.

Those who approach the present question, however, in the light of the principle involved will seriously hesitate before giving voice or vote to a problem which concerns so vitally the interests of the American people.

None will gainsay the fact that the Panama Canal was constructed as a great international highway of commerce, but are we to deduce from such a premise the conclusion that the Government which built and constructed the canal was prompted to do so by a spirit of national benevolence which recognizes a policy of relinquishing all or any of the rights that are incident to ownership of the property? I, for one, am not ready to accept such a conclusion, and, therefore, I shall oppose this present effort to surrender our rights in the canal.

During this session of Congress the party in power has never lost an opportunity to proclaim the priceless blessings of the economic policies it has ordained. Discrimination in favor of coastwise vessels for the purpose of fostering a merchant marine was one of the most emphatic articles of the party's economic code. It is now declared, notwithstanding, that exemption is a false economy, and, therefore, a policy from which this Government should surely and speedily recede. How the times have changed when the song of the "new freedom," of late so proudly proclaimed, is hushed in the deathlike silence of this abject and voluntary retreat.

Viewed from an economic standpoint, the opening of the Panama Canal in accordance with existing law would mark the beginning of a new era in the interstate trade of this Nation. Have those who propose to carry into effect this repeal considered the commercial advantages which exemption from tolls would afford to American producers in the markets along the Pacific coast? Not long since the party in power enacted what was called a competitive tariff constructed on the theory of providing more extensive markets for the products of American manufacture. Those who differed from that policy then believed that it was a surrender of American markets to the pauper labor of the world. Do you realize the further advantages offered to English and European merchants by this present proposal of repeal? They certainly realize them, and for this reason Great Britain has continued to press her claim until finally she has succeeded in obtaining the President's support and in gagging his adherents in Congress into servile submission. How can an American merchant marine be developed in the face of such disadvantages?

President Wilson, in his speech of acceptance of the nomination for the Presidency, employed the following language:

> We are not building the canal and pouring out millions upon millions of money upon its construction merely to establish a water connection between the two coasts of the continent, important and desirable as that may be, particularly from the point of view of naval defense. It would be a little ridiculous if we should build it and then have no ships to send through it. There have been years when not a single ton of freight passed through the great Suez Canal in an American bottom, so empty are the seas of our ships and seamen. We must mean to put an end to that kind of thing, or we would not be cutting a new canal at our own very doors merely for the use of our men-of-war. We must build and buy ships in competition of the world. We can do it if we will but give ourselves leave.

Already it has become too evident that we will not give ourselves leave because England has interposed an objection which the Democratic majority in this House is eager to respect in obedience to an appeal from the White House.

When the Panama Canal question was under discussion in Congress two years ago England made the claim that any discrimination in favor of our coastwise trade would violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Congress, however, rejected the claim, and its action was defended by many of the ablest men in the country. Even the British Legation in Washington admitted the right of our "bona fide coastwise commerce" to use the canal free of tolls. It is fair to conclude that the controversy would have ended there, and that no further protest would have been uttered, were it not for the transcontinental railroads, owned and controlled by English capital, whose activities continued to be exerted to keep the controversy alive.

In the course of events a new cry was raised, attacking our national honor, and, empty and unfounded though it is, it has discovered many serious advocates. Now we are asked, in the name of patriotism, to reverse our present position, whether right or wrong, because exemption from tolls is said by the President to violate the terms of a treaty.

The consensus of opinion among many of the greatest lawyers in the country favors an opposite view of the question, holding that the Government whose initiative and money are alone responsible for the construction of the canal should have something to say with respect to its regulation and control. The language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty over which the controversy has arisen is that—

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

England claims that the term "all nations" includes the United States, and, therefore, any exemptions in favor of our coastwise shipping is a direct violation of the treaty. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we are told upon reliable authority, was concluded for the purpose of removing an obstacle presented in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the United States and Great Britain which stipulated for a neutralized canal to be built on territory foreign to both parties to the contract. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty never contemplated the building of a canal on territory owned by the United States. Though nothing was ever done as a result of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it retained, nevertheless, its efficacy as a solemn and binding contract. Before the United States could proceed to build a canal on its own territory it was universally conceded that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty must be abrogated. This was done by concluding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty over which the present controversy was begun. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty adheres to the policy of neutralization expressed in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but it provides that the United States might construct, own, and manage a canal upon territory to be acquired by the United States, thereby conceding to this Government the right to use its canal for its own benefit and advantage and to dictate the terms of such use.

The question, therefore, is not so much one of tolls as it is one of control over the canal.

The United States built the Panama Canal through territory of which it has become the owner. The enterprise is purely American in its nature, and the only obligation which this Government is bound to respect, so far as the disputed treaty is concerned, is to see to it that under the terms of this treaty equality shall be extended to all other nations in the use and enjoyment of the canal. This interpretation has been accepted by such statesmen as ex-President Taft, ex-President Roosevelt, Hon. Richard Olney, a member of the Cleveland Cabinet, and until very recently by President Wilson himself.

Following the first British protest against exemption from tolls and the subsequent passage of the Panama Canal act by the House of Representatives, Mr. Taft, in a message presented to Congress on August 18, 1912, spoke as follows in relation to the question of exemption:

After full examination of the treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I am sure that it is not the intention of Congress to violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or to enact anything inconsistent with its provisions, and that it certainly is not its purpose to repeal, by subsequent enactment, the treaty in so far as it represents the law of the land.

Let us now examine the views of ex-President Roosevelt on the matter of tolls exemption, which are couched in the following statement:

I believe that the position of the United States as to the Panama Canal is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation. No ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is to the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find such great and expensive work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, as generously put at the service of all mankind.

During the presidential campaign, on August 15, 1912, President Wilson expressed his fully considered judgment on tolls exemption at Washington Park, N. J., in the following remarkable language:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on which I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America. Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

The Supreme Court of the United States, when a similar question was raised to determine whether the State of Texas, in view of existing treaties, was justified in passing a law exempting from tolls vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, in an opinion handed down by Chief Justice White, who was at that time an associate justice, decided that:

Nor is there merit in the contention that, as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade.

Indeed, Great Britain herself discriminates in favor of her own vessels engaged in her coastwise trade, notwithstanding treaty limitations, and the United States admits her indisputable right so to do. What can be the justice or logic of a position which denies to the United States the very same right which England for many years has exercised for herself?

In the face of her own practiced policy with respect to treaties, Great Britain has the effrontery now to assert that the consideration for giving up such rights as she claimed under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to obtain equality for her own ships with the ships of the United States in passing through the Panama Canal. This assertion, however, has no foundation in fact. What England contracted for, in the opinion of many great authorities relative to the interpretation of the treaty, was the beneficial right which the sovereign power in the canal must extend to all nations observing the rules as prescribed.

The principle is well settled—that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and expressed and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights. Hence, as the term "all nations" used in the treaty may be taken to mean either all without exception or all except the United States, the latter meaning is to be accepted as the true one, because the least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States. But it is unnecessary to rely upon presumptions. The treaty assumes the United States to be the owner of a canal to be built by it on its own territory, and must be taken to have had as its natural and legitimate aim the fixing of the terms upon which other nations might use it. Except as necessarily abridged by such terms, nothing in the treaty indicates any purpose to further abridge the right of the United States as canal builder and owner. In short the treaty is an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers. There is an utter absence of evidence that the United States regarded itself as one of its customers. When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant to apply.

If Great Britain has the right to use the canal upon terms of equality with the United States in respect to her vessels of commerce, then it follows from the language of the treaty that she has exactly the same right in respect to her vessels of war. Admit the first part of this proposition and the second must inevitably follow. Will even the most sanguine advocates of repeal accept the soundness of such a contention? Here is the dilemma which the controversy squarely presents, and in the light of all standards of reasoning it permits of no possible evasion.

Having carefully studied the treaties involved in this controversy, I have failed to find any language therein which justifies the conclusion that the United States is merely the keeper of a tollgate, without any of the rights that are necessarily incident to her sovereignty in the Panama Canal. I have, therefore, no doubt whatever of the rectitude of my course in voting against this proposition of repeal. America's rights, in my opinion, are of greater importance than the acquisition of a reputation for generosity. Let those who wish to yield to the unjust demands of Great Britain find all the contentment they can in this silent and servile surrender. For my part I shall enlist on the side of the numbers who are unwilling to betray their country into the clutches of British greed, and whose patriotism, rising above a patient or passive submission, steadfastly clings to the doctrine that this country shall not abandon her sovereignty in the Panama Canal; that on the contrary it shall exercise the right to legislate in behalf of its own people upon its own property, notwithstanding the protests of Great Britain or any other nation on the earth.

[Mr. CANTOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the question of whether or not the United States shall exempt its coastwise shipping passing through the Panama Canal from the burden of paying tolls has become one of the greatest causes of contention in recent years. I venture to believe, however, that the projection of invective and of personality is largely responsible for this situation, and that the real issue, if considered calmly and reduced to its lowest terms, is capable of but one solution. I shall therefore attempt to state, as baldly and as briefly as possible, the reasons which lead me to believe that the United States will be entirely within its moral, international, and economic rights in declining to repeal the exemption clause.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

First. Abuse of the President of the United States and of the British lion is equally unproductive, and impugning the patriotism or the motives of the men in Congress or out of it on opposite sides of this question does not advance us an inch.

Second. Denominating the exemption a subsidy does not close or even clarify debate.

Third. The Canal Zone, by virtue of the United States-Panama treaty of 1903, is under the sovereignty of the United States. The canal itself has cost the United States $400,000,000 already and the lives of many men. The burden of fortifying, maintaining, and operating the canal, and of making it sanitary and orderly, all have rested and will rest solely upon the United States. There is a presumption of law and of common sense that under these circumstances a nation conveys away its rights of sovereignty in property only by terms which are clear and incapable of any other reasonable interpretation. Certainly the treaty construction contended for by Great Britain, whether sound or not, constitutes a limitation upon our sovereignty in the canal.

Fourth. There is a well-known principle of international law—rebus sic stantibus. If vital changes affecting the subject matter of a treaty occur, so that it can not be fairly said that the parties contracted with reference to the changed conditions, the treaty is by implication abrogated. Respectable authorities point out that as the contracting parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty predicated their agreement upon the fundamental premise that the canal was to be constructed upon soil alien to both, and as the United States has acquired the soil upon which it has, in fact, been constructed, the treaty is void or voidable. Indeed, Sir Edward Grey, in the protest of Great Britain, recognized the principle, saying:

> Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

Fifth. It is admitted even by those who deny the right of exemption that the United States could accomplish the same result by paying subsidies to its coastwise vessels equivalent to the amount of the tolls. Great Britain, Germany, and most other countries have done this for their vessels using the Suez Canal. Indeed, Sir Edward Grey said in a note to this Government:

> His Majesty's Government do not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies * * * to any particular branches of that shipping.

If we can accomplish the result by a subterfuge, can we not do the same thing directly? Let us observe the substance and not the shadow. Further, it is well known that Europe will subsidize its own vessels passing through the Panama Canal as it has through the Suez Canal. Repeal means that our vessels will be at an absolute disadvantage with Europe.

Sixth. A nation can not always, in justice to its own, be generous to its neighbors. A full application of the "brotherhood-of-man" principle would, for example, do away with any possibility of a protective or even a revenue tariff. Considerations of commerce and of national prosperity must enter into international questions. In our vote to-day we must also consider the result of our action one way or the other, if our Nation should be at war at any time.

Seventh. If exemption is repealed now, it will, as a practical matter, be repealed for all time, whatever conditions may arise, whether we are at war or at peace. The act of repeal will be treated all over the world as a confession by the Congress of the United States that Great Britain's theory of the treaty interpretation was sound, and that our attitude hitherto has been either wilfully or negligently violative of our solemn contract. Refusal to repeal, on the other hand, enables us later, if we desire, to submit the question to arbitration, which is all that Great Britain originally asked.

Eighth. No claim is well founded that Congress in passing the exemption law did so in undue haste and without adequate consideration. The bill was before one branch of the Congress or the other practically all the time between March 16, 1912, and August 9, when it passed the Senate. Abundant opportunity for amendment was afforded throughout. Great Britain had in the meantime made its formal protest. Extended hearings upon the question were held by the appropriate committees of the Senate and of the House, the reports thereof covering over 2,000 printed pages. A Democratic House and a Republican Senate, after over six months' consideration, at length passed the exemption law. These circumstances are not conclusive, but certainly they raise a greater presumption that there was then reached a sound conclusion than will exist if we pass the repeal to-day, when this measure has been hastened through the House in three or four days, without a single amendment, under the "gag" rule, being in order.

Ninth. No one in the United States, with one exception, and no one in any foreign land knows or pretends to know the reason for the sudden and unexpected reversal of our matured and considered policy. It has the appearance of a surrender under a hidden fire of some kind. The creation of such an impression is fraught with menace in the future, at home and abroad.

Tenth. Some of the greatest authorities on international law in Great Britain and on the Continent of Europe maintain that our right to grant exemption is beyond cavil.

Eleventh. At least 14 Senators, Members of the Senate when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified, agree that the amendment to the treaty then proposed by Senator Bard specifically giving the United States the right to exempt its coastwise vessels failed of adoption because of the belief of the Senate that permission so to exempt was already included in the treaty. These Senators include Senator Bard himself, Senator LODGE, and a dozen others, about equally divided as to party. Another reason for voting down the Bard amendment was that its adoption might be feared, inferentially, to exclude the right of the United States to exempt its foreign-trade vessels.

Twelfth. When three political parties unite on the moral, political, and economic soundness of the policy of exemption; when the three candidates of those parties—Wilson, Taft, and Roosevelt—add their voices to emphasize such soundness; when the leaders of the three parties in the House of Representatives—men whose honor is untarnished and whose patriotism is unquestioned—Speaker CLARK; Mr. UNDERWOOD, the present majority leader; Mr. KITCHIN, the next majority leader; Mr. MANN, the minority leader; and Mr. MURDOCK, the Progressive leader, are in accord; when publicists skilled in international law, of the eminence of Richard Olney, formerly Secretary of State; Chandler P. Anderson, formerly Counselor of the Department of State; Hannis Taylor, and Judge Feuille, law officer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, after deep reflection and with a keen appreciation of the importance of the question, hold similar views; when all these men are arrayed on one side we must admit that that side of the argument probably is not wholly childish, immoral, unpatriotic, or unsound.

THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY IS BROAD ENOUGH TO PERMIT THE EXEMPTION OF ALL UNITED STATES VESSELS, WHETHER ENGAGED IN THE FOREIGN OR THE COASTWISE TRADE.

First. There has been much learned discussion of the extent to which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty affects the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and its interpretation. The plain fact is that the only reference to the early treaty in the body of the later one is in article 1, which expressly provides that "the present treaty shall supersede" the earlier treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is dead and buried.

Second. The alpha and omega of the case against exemption is found in rule 1 of article 3:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality * * *.

The sole question, so far as the treaty interpretation goes, is whether these words mean what at first glance they undoubtedly seem to mean.

Third. But rule 1, a portion of which is cited, is one of six rules attached as subheads of article 3, the text of which is in part:

> The United States adopts * * * the following rules * * *.

That word "adopts" tells the whole story. That word points clearly and irresistibly to the conclusion that the United States as an owner is setting forth the terms on which its own property may be used. If this is so, vessels of the United States are not included in the operation of the rule unless the owner desires to have them. An owner of a private gallery posts a notice at the entrance setting forth the hours and the terms of admission for the general public. The public is grateful for the opportunity thus afforded; it does not attempt even to assert that the owner, his family, servants, and guests are included within the purview of the "rules" which he has "adopted."

Fourth. The canal, in the words of the rule quoted, is not free and open to the vessels of all nations but to the vessels of all nations "observing these rules," a very different thing. As we have seen, the United States has "adopted" these rules. Manifestly it is not expected to obey them; and manifestly, too, the above clause, upon which the advocates of repeal rest their whole case, simply prescribes the terms upon which the vessels of other nations are to be admitted.

Fifth. This last argument—that the United States is not intended itself to be bound by the first rule in the article—gains force from an examination of the other five. These provide, inter alia, that the canal shall never be blockaded; that the warships of a belligerent shall not revictual or take stores in the canal; that the transit of warships shall be effected with the least possible delay; that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops or munitions of war; that the provisions of the rules shall govern waters up to a point 3 marine miles from either end; that warships of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters more than 24 hours; that the warship of one belligerent shall not pursue that of another for 24 hours.

Do these last five rules include the United States and its war vessels? The question carries its own answer. Indeed, Great Britain has herself admitted that they do not. Sir Edward Grey said in his protest:

His Majesty's Government do not question its (the United States) title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

All this being so, can it still be said that the United States, admittedly excluded from rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, is yet included within rule 1, which in context and construction is exactly parallel with the other five?

Sixth. This portion of rule 1 calls for equality of "vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules."

If vessels of commerce of the United States are included it is clear, as a matter of grammar and of construction, that vessels of war of the United States are also included; yet Great Britain and most advocates of the repeal admit that they are not and can not be. But either we have power to exempt both classes or neither.

Seventh. Article 2 provides that, subject to the provisions of the treaty, the United States, after the construction of the canal—shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

This is a broad statement, suggestive of full sovereignty in the United States. It would surely require perfectly plain language elsewhere in the treaty to narrow it to the construction contended for by the advocates of the repeal. In other words, this language raises a presumption of virtual omnipotence in the United States, which, unless rebutted, will prevail. And there is no language which rebuts the presumption so far as toll exemption is concerned.

Eighth. Let us assume for a moment that the United States is included in rule 1. England's claim has been that if coastwise vessels of the United States were exempt, its own vessels would perchance have to pay not only their share of the expense of the canal, but a portion of that which our coastwise vessels would otherwise bear. But this assumes that the tolls are based on estimated actual receipts and expenditures; this is not the fact. In fixing the rates to be charged there were included the sums which the United States coastwise traffic would have paid if it had not been exempted. So Great Britain bears none of our burden, and the equality required by the treaty—though not of the United States, as we have seen—is not on any hypothesis disturbed. Equality does not mean identity.

EVEN IF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY BE NARROWED SO AS TO FORBID THE EXEMPTION OF VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES ENGAGED IN THE FOREIGN TRADE, IT CERTAINLY DOES NOT APPLY TO VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES ENGAGED IN THE COASTWISE TRADE.

First. Our Federal laws limit our coastwise trade to United States bottoms. There is no discrimination against Great Britain, no lack of the equality required by rule 1—again assuming that rule to include the United States—by exempting our coastwise vessels. Great Britain could not engage in that trade anyway, and our regulations concerning it can not interest her. It is purely a domestic question.

Second. It is even more a domestic and internal question, now that the Canal Zone is for all practical purposes a part of the United States. A coastwise vessel of the United States passing through the canal will not, in the legal aspect of the case, differ materially from a similar vessel passing down the Mississippi River.

Third. Great Britain has virtually admitted our right as to coastwise trade. In the first British note of protest, dated July 8, 1912, it is said:

If the trade could be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited, it may be that no objection could be taken.

ANALOGIES IN OTHER TREATIES.

(1) THE TREATY OF 1815.

The treaty of 1815 between Great Britain and the United States contains the following language:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

Yet the Supreme Court of the United States in 1904, Mr. Justice (now Chief Justice) White delivering the opinion of the court, held that a State law and a Federal law which exempted coastwise steam vessels of the United States from the payment of pilotage charges did not infringe the treaty. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

England has never objected to this decision.

The same treaty also provides:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed * * * in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

Yet British harbor, wharf, and tonnage rates upon American vessels have for a century been two to six times as heavy as those charged her own coastwise vessels. Does it lie in the mouth of Great Britain to object now?

(2) THE TREATIES WITH COLOMBIA AND PANAMA.

Article 17 of our 1903 treaty with the Republic of Colombia provides in part that Colombia—shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind.

Article 19 of our 1903 treaty with the Republic of Panama contains an almost identical provision.

Both treaties expressly recite and embody rule 1 of article 3, as well as the rest of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Although the concessions therein constituted privileges beyond those enjoyed by Great Britain, they were in return for reciprocal concessions granted to the United States. Great Britain has in the past officially recognized that in such a case no breach of the "most-favored-nation" clause in a treaty arises. Great Britain did not utter a word of protest to either treaty for nine years. It is perhaps fair to say that during that period she regarded the language in rule 1 as a paraphrase of the "most-favored-nation" clause.

John Hay negotiated these two treaties. Can it be that he would wittingly have violated the provisions of the treaty with England negotiated but a year or two before and specifically referred to in the later ones?

(3) THE TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The treaty of 1871 between the United States and Great Britain, commonly known as the treaty of Washington, provides, in article 27:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

The United States similarly agreed that British subjects should enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

Here falls the argument by analogy which is made by the advocates of repeal. Rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty says "on terms of entire equality," not, as here, "on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States." The distinction is obvious and fundamental.

ECONOMIC QUESTIONS.

First. The protest against the exemption act is demonstrably the work of the American and Canadian transcontinental railroads. Their stake, as President Wilson clearly pointed out in 1912, is obvious and tremendous. The amount of tolls paid by an American coastwise vessel going from New York to San Francisco can be added by the railroads to the freight on similar goods going overland, and the consumer will pay the freight, and the railroads be thereby enriched. The repeal is a subsidy of the transcontinental railroads, American and Canadian.

Second. The counter argument that the exemption is in aid of trust- and railroad-owned vessels passing through the canal is met by the provisions of section 11 of the canal act of August 24, 1912, which provides, first, that no railroad or other common carrier shall "own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal" with which it does or may compete for traffic, and second, that no vessel shall be permitted to pass through the canal if owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any person or company doing business in violation of the Sherman Act.

Here is a guaranty that every coastwise vessel going through the canal will be as clean as a hound's tooth.

Third. Our merchant marine is but a pitiful shadow of what it once was and what it may be. Let us give it a chance to live and grow.

Fourth. "The Panama Canal is now a part of our coast line." We have spent $627,098,236, exclusive of the Panama Canal, for our waterways. The whole country has borne the burden, not its shipping; yet there has been no talk of subsidy. The Soo Canal, connecting Lakes Superior and Huron, carries many millions of tons of freight; yet no tolls are charged. The same situation is true of the Erie Canal. What is the distinction? The Panama Canal is no different in kind.

Fifth. I am aware that thoughtful men differ on this economic question. But that question was resolved, rightly or wrongly, two years ago. The question left to-day is an international, not an economic one. The question must be decided on moral and legal grounds. Again, if we give in to-day, we have decided for all time that we can never, whatever happens, make concessions to our American shipping in the canal. I assert that every argument of treaty interpretation, of moral propriety, and of international expediency, requires a vote to-day against repeal.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this momentous question, practically involving the Monroe doctrine, so long upheld by the United States, should be brought before Congress. We are asked to surrender our sovereignty over a canal dug in our own territory, and which will cost the United States over $400,000,000 before it is opened to traffic. Is there a Member of Congress who would have voted for such an expenditure knowing that this Nation, while bearing the enormous expense, would have no advantage in the use of the canal over any other nation—even our enemy in case of war? And yet that is the proposition the President of the United States asks us to accept.

It is to the credit of Congress that, despite this amazing request of the President, whom I believe to be an honest man, and with his immense power back of him, the leaders of his party in this House refuse to do his bidding. Our honored Speaker, who had a majority of the votes in the Baltimore convention in favor of his nomination for President, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and also the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and many other eminent men in the Democratic Party, including Senators from New York, New Jersey, and many other States, refuse to bow their knees to a foreign power for some reason which the President does not disclose. Our forefathers fought long years for their independence, and even refused to pay a small tax on tea imposed by the British Government, but we are asked to yield to that Government and to every other nation on earth the use of the Panama Canal to precisely the same extent and on the same terms as those under which we use it ourselves. But not a single dollar was contributed by any one of those nations toward the expense of constructing the canal, which has been dug on our own territory.

NO REASON FOR REPUDIATING THE LAW.

For what reason are we asked to repudiate our national position on this question? Congress voted to exempt coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls in the canal, the same as we do with our shipping on other waterways constructed by the Government, which have cost us over $650,000,000. There are no tolls for our shipping on any of those waterways and there should be none on the Panama Canal. We have expended nearly $150,000,000 on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, but no tolls are imposed; neither are they charged on the "Soo" and other Government waterways which are maintained at Government expense. We have voted to allow foreign vessels to use the Panama Canal on precisely the same terms as our own vessels in the foreign trade. That is all that could be asked of us, and all that we agreed to do in the treaty with Great Britain. That is the view of some of the most eminent lawyers in this and in other countries, including not only many of those in this House, but such men as ex-Attorney General Olney, Hannis Taylor, ex-Presidents Taft and Roosevelt, Senator O'GORMAN, long a member of the New York Supreme Court, ex-Secretary of State Knox, and some eminent lawyers in both Germany, England, and France. The United States Supreme Court has decided the point at issue in this matter in favor of the contention of those who oppose this most unfortunate bill to repeal the existing law.

What reasons are advanced by the President in support of his extraordinary position? The only reason he gives is that the law provides for a false economic policy, and that foreign countries do not agree with our contention in this matter. He does not say what countries or give any particulars, but simply asks Congress, as a favor to him, to repudiate its action as approved by nearly 14,000,000 voters in 1912, and to make this country the obedient servant of some foreign power. We have never known a time, since the country began the struggle for its independence, when foreign powers all agreed to any action of ours which in the least degree interfered with their profits in foreign trade, or otherwise. Nations are simply on a par with individuals. They look out for their own interests and care not for their neighbors, as a rule, providing they have something to gain by opposing the honest course of such neighbors.

THE NATION'S POLICY CALLED A FALSE ONE.

Now, as to the false economic policy of which the President speaks, there has been no change in that respect since 1912, when the President himself, in a public speech, approved that policy and when his party in its platform unanimously declared in favor of the exemption of coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls on the canal. There has been some intimation that that plank was adopted in the Democratic platform without consideration. The proceedings of the convention show such an assertion to be without any foundation. Mr. Bryan, now Secretary of State, was chairman of the committee on platform, which was composed of many eminent Democrats, and it is conceded that Mr. Bryan drew up the platform. To say that he agreed to anything that he did not approve would be ridiculous, and the same with every other member of the platform committee and of the convention itself. Mr. Bryan says that a man who violates a party platform is a criminal—worse than one who embezzles money. The platform itself declares, as President Wilson has remarked, that it was "not molasses to catch flies; it means business; it means what it says." And yet, after that platform declaration and after that statement by Mr. Wilson, and after the platform had been used, as Senator MARTINE of New Jersey states, to great advantage in the canvass, so far as this particular plank was concerned, the President comes before you and asks you to repudiate it because this plank was false "in an economic sense." Secretary Bryan has said:

> I desire to announce it as a settled principle, not to be questioned in this country, that a platform is binding upon every honest man who runs upon that platform. Far be it from me to say that any man elected to any office should, as an official, do a thing that his conscience condemns. But does that mean that he should violate his platform? No; it seems that his conscience should commence to work before the election and not hibernate until after the election.

Mr. Bryan holds that if a man can not carry out the platform on which he was elected he should resign and allow some one else to fulfill the sacred promises of his party; and that is sound doctrine, particularly when the platform plank, as in this case regarding the tolls, received the approval, practically unanimous, of the voters of the country. The Progressive Party, on whose platform Mr. Roosevelt was a candidate, had a similar plank, and President Taft, who was nominated by the Republicans, not only signed the law providing for the exemption of coastwise shipping from tolls but he filed a memorandum with the law expressly approving of that clause.

President Wilson has no ground whatever for asking Congress to repudiate the sovereignty of this Nation over the Panama Canal, constructed on our territory. The "false economic policy" which the President speaks of has been the policy of this country since its foundation, and it is a little remarkable that he should not only repudiate his party's platform, on which he was elected, but should also declare against the policy of this country, always followed, in allowing the free use by its own vessels of Government waterways.

A PECULIAR SITUATION.

There are many peculiar things about this proposition. It is virtually a movement started by the transcontinental railroads of Canada, which are owned in England, for their own benefit. Lord Cowdray, otherwise known as Mr. Pearson, who is president of the Tehuantepec Railway, another British concern, is also brother-in-law of Sir Edward Grey, the British secretary of state. The greater part of the traffic over the Tehuantepec Railway comes from Hawaii and is destined for American ports. If the Panama Canal charges tolls on such traffic, as would be the case if tolls were imposed on coastwise shipping, a great deal of it would continue to come by way of this British railroad, which charges high rates for the short passage. Hence it is to the benefit of Earl Grey's brother-in-law that the canal should not pass American coastwise vessels free from toll.

It is also greatly to the advantage of the Canadian Pacific and other transcontinental roads that tolls should be imposed on our coastwise vessels. These foreign vessels belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railroad and to other foreign lines are heavily subsidized. They are constructed in foreign ports, where wages are not half as much as they are in the United States. The rates for money are also much lower in England than in this country, as is the case elsewhere in Europe. The wages paid on foreign vessels are very much less than on American vessels. That is an indisputable fact, attested by the Commissioner of Navigation, by congressional committees, and by the records of foreign governments, as well as our own. Hence, foreign ships can be operated at a much lower expense than American vessels and carry freights at lower rates, to say nothing of their subsidies, and still make handsome profits. If our vessels are compelled to pay tolls on the coastwise traffic in the canal, it will help the continental railroads and also the vessels belonging to Canada. Much of the coastwise traffic could be taken across the border and shipped by Canadian subsidized lines and landed either in the United States or in a Canadian port. The freight rates on iron or steel products, for instance, from Pittsburgh to Montreal are about as low as from Pittsburgh to Baltimore or New York. Hence, you will see the enormous advantage the Canadian subsidized boats would have over our own if both had to pay the same tolls on our canal. The transcontinental railway rates will be fixed by the cost of transportation by the canal. That is also indisputable. Hence, the imposition of tolls on coastwise vessels will help the railroads as well as the Canadian lines. Those are the interests which have been urging the British Government to insist upon the imposition of tolls upon American coastwise vessels.

THE PRESIDENT'S REMARKABLE COURSE.

It is remarkable, under these circumstances, that the President should say to us that we must not discuss the right or wrong of this question, but vote to reverse our own action and repudiate the national paltforms and the national policy on this subject. The talk of the tolls on coastwise vessels being a subsidy is without any foundation. The competition between the railroads and the vessels will always be keen as long as the railroads are forbidden to use their own vessels through the canal, which the law now forbids. The rates will be put at as low a figure as can be made with any promise of a small profit. If tolls are charged, that means higher rates on the boats and higher rates accordingly on the railroads. The consumers pay the freight. The president of the Hawaiian Steamship Co. says that it is immaterial to his line whether or not tolls are charged, because the consumers will pay whatever the amount may be.

When the advocates of woman suffrage called on the President and asked him to say something in their behalf, his reply was that he could not do so because his party's national platform had not given any expression on the subject, and it was his duty to follow the platform. Is he following it in this matter of tolls in the Panama Canal?

One great advantage which the President's party gained in the last national canvass was its constant reiteration that the Republicans had not lived up to their platform on the tariff question. There was not the least foundation for that charge. The Republican platform did not pledge itself to revise the tariff upward or downward, but the Democrats made a great many people believe that the party had violated its platform pledges. But this monstrous violation of the Democratic platform in regard to tolls is only one instance of many that may be charged to that party at the present time. They attacked the Republicans for lavish expenditures and promised rigid economy, and what is the result? The expenditures at the last session were the greatest in the history of the Nation, and they promise to be still greater at this session. There is need of rigid economy, because the new tariff law has greatly reduced the revenues while curtailing the foreign trade of the Nation. There has been a vast increase of importation of farm and other products which can be raised here at home, but trade in other lines is curtailed. That was precisely the case under the last Democratic law when Mr. Cleveland was President. There was a big deficit at that time, and bonds had to be issued to pay the current expenses of the Government. It looks now as though we would have a like experience at a very early date.

A BIG DEFICIT FORESHADOWED.

The revenue from the income tax will be nothing like as much as was promised by the originators of that measure. The deficit is constantly increasing and so are the appropriations. Hence the violation of the party pledge of rigid economy will be impressed upon the voters at the coming election. Then, again, it was promised that appointments for Alaska should be made from residents of that Territory, but the President has nominated for one of the prominent offices a man who had never been within a thousand miles of the Territory. Then, another promise in that platform was, "that the recommendations for judges should be made public." That has also been repudiated. Then the platform and the President in his canvass promised strict adherence to the civil-service law, but riders were put on bills in violation of those civil-service pretensions and the President approved them.

These are mere indications of how the Democratic platform, which Mr. Bryan says is a crime to violate, has been superseded in a scandalous measure. That, perhaps, is the President's excuse for this monstrous violation in regard to the Panama Canal. There never was a platform used to a greater extent as "molasses to catch flies" than this platform adopted in Baltimore in 1912.

A SURRENDER TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Other nations than our own are now paying $46,927,220 annually as subsidies to their vessels. Many of them repay to such vessels the tolls that are paid on the Suez Canal, and they will do the same thing in regard to the Panama Canal. Russia and Spain have already made appropriations to pay the Panama tolls on the vessels of their respective countries. But under the British contention, we can not discriminate in favor of our ships. We are in the position of having expended $400,000,000 on our own territory, but under the contention of the British Government in which we are asked to acquiesce, we can not do a single thing for any American interest in our own canal that we must not do for any other nation. We are now fortifying the canal at considerable expense and are providing for equipment to our vessels and other such things along the canal, but the British contend that we have no right to do that. They also hold that we must compel our war vessels to pay tolls, and that in case of our being at war with Japan, as an instance, we must give the Japanese war vessels the same rights in the canal that we give our own vessels, and that after passing an enemy's vessel through the canal we can not pass one of our own warships, so as to allow it to follow the enemy for 24 hours. We are also forbidden to keep any of our warships within 3 marine leagues of the entrance of the canal. The money we are now expending there is absolutely wasted if this British contention is to be acquiesced in. And to subscribe to that doctrine is the whole purpose of the existing bill, which is being crowded through this House under the most monstrous gag rule ever enforced in this Congress. No amendment of any kind is allowed to the bill, and all this is done by the majority of a party that made war on the so-called "Cannon rules."

A CASE PROVING OUR RIGHT TO DISCRIMINATE.

In 1815 we entered into a treaty with Great Britain under which we abolished discriminative duties which had built up our shipping to an enormous extent. That treaty provided:

That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

But under that agreement the British gave favored rates to her coastwise shipping and immediately subsidized her foreign shipping. We gave, in return, lower rates on our coastwise shipping than on foreign shipping. The agreement in that treaty was almost precisely the same as in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty about the Panama Canal, under which the British now assert that we have no right to favor coastwise shipping.

It was the belief of our people when this Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated and ratified that we had precisely the same rights in favoring our coastwise shipping as in the treaty of 1815, which right had been upheld by the United States Supreme Court. Coastwise trade is interstate commerce, and whether it goes through the Panama Canal, belonging to the Nation, or through the "Soo" or any other canal, the Constitution lodges the power to regulate solely with Congress. A treaty can not take away that right. The Senate rejected the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty because it did not, in explicit terms, abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and provide that the United States should have the right to fortify and defend the canal and that the other powers should not have the right to interfere with the management of the canal, all of which contentions were granted in the second treaty. Secretary Hay, who negotiated the treaty, said of it:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

THE UNITED STATES OWNS AND CONTROLS THE CANAL.

The United States, on one side, is to own, hold, build, and manage and control the canal, and, on the other side, "all nations," whom Great Britain said she represented, if they observe the rules, are to have the use of the canal on equality. The United States agreed that there should be no discrimination against any such nation, which simply means that all nations which observe the rules are to be treated alike. The United States never agreed not to discriminate in its own favor. It is absurd to say that we can not allow our ships any privileges of docking, refitting, supplying coal or stores, repairing, or any other benefit not allowed to the ships of all nations. An American vessel entering a British port coming from an American port pays 56 cents per ton port charges, while English vessels pay only 20 cents. In the United States ports foreign vessels pay 12 cents port charges per ton while American vessels pay nothing. Pilotage charges are also excepted to American vessels when in domestic trade. All that is done in both countries under the provisions of a treaty guaranteeing equality in trade the same as is provided for in connection with the Panama Canal. This merely illustrates how utterly unfounded is the contention of the British Government that we must not favor our coastwise shipping or give any advantage to United States vessels in any shape, form, or manner over foreign vessels in the Panama Canal.

THE WELLAND CANAL AS AN ILLUSTRATION.

We have heard much about the Welland Canal in this controversy. We have an agreement with the United Kingdom under which our vessels are granted the same rights in the Welland Canal as Canadian vessels are granted in the "Soo" or St. Marys Canal. Under that agreement we allowed Canadian vessels to use our canals on the same terms as American vessels; but Canada imposed a difference of 18 cents a ton in favor of her own vessels using the Welland Canal when they carried their loads as far as Montreal. That discriminating tax was put on to prevent their vessels from unloading at Oswego or other American ports on Lake Ontario. Our protestations met with no response until our Government retaliated by discriminating in favor of American vessels on the "Soo" or St. Marys Canal. Under that retaliation Canada removed the discrimination on the Welland Canal, but in doing so the British Government asserted that it did not relinquish its claim to the right to so discriminate, but merely abolished the discrimination in order to get equal rights for Canadian vessels in the "Soo" Canal. That is the situation; precisely similar to the Panama Canal. The British Government holds no rights of any shape or description in Panama territory. The Canadian Government has been pursuing a course so as to make the use of our canals connecting the Great Lakes of no benefit to her. When Canada has its own canals then the discrimination will probably be resumed on the Welland Canal, which only goes to show that we should have our own Niagara ship canal connecting Lake Erie and Lake Ontario; but it also goes to prove how utterly preposterous is the claim of Great Britain in regard to the Panama Canal.

DISCRIMINATION TO FAVOR RAILROADS.

The discrimination in this case against our shipping appears to be for the benefit of transcontinental railroads in the same way that the tariff bill discriminated in favor of the South. Peanuts, rice, and other southern products were retained on the dutiable list, but northern agricultural products were put on the free list. One of the Members of this body, contending for the passage of this bill—and he represents a southern constituency—asserted that Georgia pine was entitled to as much consideration as Oregon and Washington lumber, which would be brought from the Pacific coast by way of the Panama Canal. That looks as though he was actuated by a desire to keep the Pacific coast lumber from competing with the southern product; but, as a matter of fact, it would be Canadian lumber that would offer the competition, as the tariff bill practically killed the lumber industry on the Pacific coast of the United States by subjecting it to the competition of lumber produced in Canada by the use of Japanese, Chinese, and Hindu labor. Another Member from the South asserted that lumber on the Gulf and Atlantic coasts would go down $3 and $5 a thousand as a result of this free-tolls clause. He declared that even now lumber from Washington was invading southern hardwood markets. That is another evidence of the narrow spirit actuating some of the advocates of this measure.

Senator Root, when Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty giving Colombia the right to ship troops, materials of war, and ships of war through the canal free, which shows that even he, although opposing the exemption of tolls on coastwise shipping, could not agree altogether with the British contention.

PANAMA AND SUEZ RATES CONTRASTED.

The tonnage of coastwise vessels was taken into consideration in fixing the tolls to be imposed on the canal, so that in exempting coastwise shipping from tolls no extra charge whatever is imposed on foreign ships. England, which controls the Suez Canal, fixes rates that pay dividends of 31 per cent. The rates on the Panama Canal, which cost over three times as much as the Suez Canal, are a good deal lower than those on the Suez route. That shows the generosity of our Government in this matter, which is not expecting dividends, but gives the commerce of the entire world the benefit of our enormous expenditure in behalf of the canal. It is entirely clear that if we can exempt war vessels from tolls we can exempt coastwise shipping. And if we can not exempt one we can not exempt the other. This shows the feebleness of some of the arguments that war vessels can be exempted from tolls, but not coastwise shipping. Lord Lansdowne, in a communication in October, 1901, about the canal, said that the purpose the British Government had in view was that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than any other power. In other words, he was seeking the most-favored-nation clause and nothing more, which we are entirely willing to grant.

Senator LODGE, of the Foreign Affairs Committee, who reported the treaty to the Senate, said:

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls on its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put on our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

The treaty could never have been ratified under any other view of the matter.

NOT ARBITRATION, BUT SURRENDER.

Sir Edward Grey, the British minister of foreign affairs, expressed a willingness to submit the question to arbitration. President Wilson does not propose arbitration, but surrender. The Democratic tariff law provided for a reduction of 5 per cent on imports brought to this country in American ships. That was done on the ground that it would promote American shipping. But the administration has sought to nullify that clause by issuing an order that it should not be carried into effect. The board of appraisers has stated that the law must be carried into effect when that can be done, but the administration proposes to carry the matter to the Supreme Court. There is hardly a doubt but that the decision of the court will uphold the appraisers and that a considerable sum will have to be refunded as a result of this unwise determination of the administration to nullify an act of Congress.

Ambassador Page, who made a speech in London recently to the effect that we constructed the Panama Canal for the benefit of Great Britain, seems to have known more about the administration policy than the Democratic leaders in this House. We have practically no ships of our own in the foreign trade, and if our coastwise trade is to have no favor in the canal British ships will continue to grow in tonnage and volume, while our own will continue to decline so far as the foreign trade is concerned. The British Government has recently increased the subsidy in the Royal Mail Line $360,000 a year "to develop the service," and under such a policy, with full benefit for our expenditure in the Panama Canal, she will reap a great harvest.

The railroads did not want the canal built and they now desire to weaken its competition, and it is most extraordinary that the administration should lend itself to that policy. The passage of the battleship Oregon around South America in the time of the Spanish War gave great impetus to the construction of a canal across the Isthmus. Our need of such a waterway for naval and military purposes was very pressing at that time and is so now. But the passage of this bill and the carrying into effect of the policy now marking the Democratic administration of this Government not only nullifies any advantage from the canal, but really makes the situation worse by giving all that advantage to other nations.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, perhaps not since the close of the Civil War has a question confronted the American people fraught with so much importance as to its outcome and its immediate and remote effect upon the people of the United States and the people of all the world as the question pending before us, known as the Panama Canal tolls proposition. For more than half a century the question has been agitated and discussed as to the building of a canal that would connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans at Panama. This agitation and discussion led to the making of many treaties by our Government with different powers whose interests would be affected by the construction of the canal.

Finally the United States and Great Britain, in 1900, entered into a solemn compact, agreement, or convention, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was duly ratified by both Governments, and which gave to the United States the right to construct and build a canal. The treaty as agreed upon and ratified by both contracting parties is as follows:

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States: John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America.

And Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India: The Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., Her Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States.

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 2.

The high contracting parties desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof, for the purposes of this convention, and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

7. No fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

ARTICLE 3.

The high contracting parties will, immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

ARTICLE 4.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London within six months from the date hereof, or earlier, if possible.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 5th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1900.

JOHN HAY.
PAUNCEFOTE.

Under the Constitution of the United States, when treaties are ratified by the Senate they become, along with the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, and we can no more violate a treaty solemnly entered into with a foreign power and maintain our national and international honor than we can violate any of the plain provisions of the Constitution itself and maintain our honor at home. The Constitution plainly provides that treaties made under it shall be the supreme law of the land, and the Supreme Court in construing this provision in more than 100 cases has placed treaties made by our Government and ratified by the Senate on a parity with the Constitution itself. To violate a treaty thus made is to violate the Constitution itself.

During the seven years I have been a Member of this House I have never observed a more sincere and honest purpose injected into debate than I have on this occasion by each Member of the House who has discussed the question at issue. I believe that each Member is actuated by the highest motives and loftiest purposes; and I will go farther and say that I do not believe any Member of the House has been cajoled, threatened, or coerced in any way or manner whatever; but I believe each Member is actuated by a sincere desire to arrive at the true meaning of the treaty and willing to govern himself accordingly.

For one, I am in favor of the pending bill, and intend to vote for it. I would do this even if the President was opposing the repeal, because in doing so I believe I am doing my duty as a Representative, not only to my country but to the nations of the earth. As an American citizen I stand for America and all of its interests, and in taking this position I believe I am serving my country in endeavoring to enable it to live up to its agreement.

To me this question presents itself in a double aspect: First, shall we live up to our treaty obligations? This involves our national honor. Second, it presents an economic viewpoint. Either view, to my mind, presents a justification for me to vote for the bill.

The first clause of the treaty provides:

The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Around this paragraph have centered most of the argument as to the rights of the United States over the canal. A few rules of construction of written contracts may not be amiss in this connection. It is a uniform rule of construction, to which I know of no exception, that courts do not sit to make contracts, but leave the parties to the language employed by them, and construes the contract from the language used by the contracting parties themselves. Another rule of construction is that where the contract is plain and unambiguous courts will neither read words into it nor take words therefrom, but will from the whole context of the contract determine what the parties meant when the contract was entered into.

Another rule of construction is that courts will not take a single paragraph in a contract and from it undertake to determine what the parties meant, but will take the contract as an entirety and from the entire text determine the meaning of the parties thereto. This same rule of construction can easily be applied here in Congress, and with these rules of construction confronting us, and taking the contract as an entirety, what did the parties mean when they agreed to the treaty? What did the United States and Great Britain mean when they inserted paragraph 1 in this treaty?

A treaty between nations is as much a binding contract when entered into between them as if it had been entered into between private individuals. No man can read paragraph 1 in connection with all the other paragraphs in the treaty and come to any conclusion other than that the canal shall be open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire and exact equality. To say that by the terms of this article the United States has the right to exempt any of its vessels from the payment of tolls is to read into the contract something the parties did not place therein at the time it was made and ratified.

In paragraph 1 the phrase "all nations" is used. This includes every sovereign nation upon the earth capable of entering into a contract or treaty and agreeing to be bound thereby; and to say that the United States, having agreed to and used the phrase "all nations," shall now be permitted to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is to exclude from the terms of the treaty itself the very phrase included by it when it used the words "all nations."

No better argument can be used to exclude or exempt the coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls than can be used to exempt all American vessels flying the American flag from the payment of tolls while passing through the canal. If the argument be sound that the United States has the right under the terms of the treaty to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, then it follows as night the day that it has a right under the treaty to exempt all of its vessels from paying tolls while passing through the canal, whether engaged in coastwise trade or not. From this reasoning there is no escape. To exempt a part of our vessels from paying tolls would be a justification to go further and exempt all American vessels passing through the canal from the payment of tolls, and this in the very face of the plain written language that the vessels of all nations shall be treated upon terms of entire equality.

No word found in all the English language carries with it a meaning any broader, wider, or deeper, or of greater weight than the word "all." It includes everything—time, space, and eternity, if necessary. And our Government, having the right to choose its own language, and having used the word "all," thereby necessarily including the United States; there is no escape from the construction of this contract that the United States when it adopted and used this word in the treaty it intended that no vessels owned by citizens of the United States or flying the American flag, whether engaged in the coastwise trade or otherwise, should receive any advantage in the way of discriminatory rates, while passing through the canal, over the vessels of any other nation. If the vessels of any nation be permitted to go through the canal without the payment of tolls, it can not be successfully contended that the vessels thus favored are going through the canal upon terms of entire equality, as the treaty says they shall be treated. Vessels going through the canal and paying tolls go through with a burden upon them, while vessels going through the canal free of tolls go through free of burden, and this burden must be maintained by the vessels required to pay tolls.

Again, applying the rule of inclusion, when the United States used the word "all" it certainly intended thereby to include all of its own vessels, no matter whether engaged in the coastwise trade or otherwise, while passing through the canal. And applying the rule of exclusion to exclude any vessel of commerce, whether engaged in the coastwise trade or otherwise, owned by citizens of the United States, and to say that these vessels shall not pay tolls while passing through the canal is to read into the contract entered into between our Government and Great Britain language not found in the treaty either directly or indirectly, a thing no court of the United States would for one moment tolerate. And if courts would not tolerate it, certainly Congress ought not to tolerate it.

If anyone doubts this to be the proper construction of the treaty, let him read the amendment to the treaty adopted by the Senate, which is as follows:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing, by its own forces, the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

By this amendment it is plain that the United States intended to include itself in the treaty when it used the word "all" by reserving to the United States the right to take such action as it might deem necessary toward securing its own forces or the defenses of the United States. If the United States included itself in this amendment, which it plainly did, then it must follow that the United States included itself when it said that the vessels of all nations engaged in commerce should be treated upon terms of entire equality with each other. To my mind this is conclusive that the United States, when it made and ratified the treaty, intended to include itself and its vessels when it used the phrase "all nations."

It is impossible to comply with the terms of this treaty upon entire equality among all the nations of the earth, and permit any vessel engaged in the coastwise trade to pass through the canal free of charge. The only way to comply with the treaty upon entire equality is to treat the vessels of all nations, including those of our own, going through the canal, upon the same exact terms and conditions, either requiring them all to pay the same freight rate or else permitting them all to go through free of any charge. In my judgment no twisting or distorting of the English language can justify any other conclusion. To me it is so plain that a fool, though a wayfaring man, need not err in his construction of the contract. It is not a question as to whether we ought, in the first instance, to have entered into this contract, nor is it a question whether Great Britain drove a hard bargain upon us—a thing I deny. The sole question from this viewpoint is, Shall we as a Nation live up to our contracts and demonstrate to the world that we meant what we said when we agreed to the language set forth in paragraph 1 of article 2.

He who contends that the United States has been cajoled or bullied by fear of threat of war or otherwise to change its position will not get far when this language is understood by all the people of the United States. Contracts between nations should be as sacred and sincere and as religiously lived up to as are contracts between private individuals. The law of our land will not permit an individual to violate the plain written terms of his contract without holding him responsible in damages to the party with whom he contracted, and if we violate the terms of this plain written contract the nations of the world will hold us responsible for its violation.

Since the time our Nation was born, and was still wearing swaddling clothes and lying in the manger, we have stood shoulder to shoulder with the nations of the earth upon the high plane of fulfilling to the strict letter of the law every contract and every treaty obligation we have ever entered into with any nation. And we have stood like the rocks of Gibraltar, insisting upon every other nation with whom we had a treaty fulfilling their contracts to the strict letter of the law. We did this when we were young and unable to defend ourselves on sea, but we did it from a high moral viewpoint, setting an example ourselves of living up to our contracts, demanding and insisting that other nations with whom we had contracts do likewise. Now that we have grown strong—our people as numerous as the sands of the sea, with an inexhaustible supply of wealth, able to cope by brute force, if necessary, with every nation upon the earth—shall we, backed by a population of 100,000,000, fail to carry out our treaty obligations? I say "no." Justice, equality, and righteousness say no.

The President has been severely criticized during this debate for the course he has taken. I desire to commend his course. Planting himself squarely upon the eternal rock of justice between man and man, nation and nation, he is to-day holding aloft the principle upon which we have stood since we took our place among the nations of the earth. Instead of bringing dishonor upon our Nation he is bringing to it honor, credit, and glory. He is demonstrating to the nations of the earth that we are not a commercially mad nation, but that we are still standing upon the eternal principles of justice and right, willing to live up to our obligations.

It has been said of him, and of those of us who propose to follow him, that we are violating a platform promise and pledge. I do not know, nor do I care, how the plank found its way into the platform of the Baltimore convention. To put it mildly, I am disposed to believe that special interest was quietly, secretly, stealthily getting its work in at that convention while the good, kind audience were asleep, thereby endeavoring to commit the American people to an un-American policy for the exclusive benefit of certain special interests in this country. And that special interest, the worst monopoly that ever fastened itself upon the American people, worse than all the Standard Oils, the Sugar, the Tobacco, or the Steel Trusts, more greedy, ravenous, and rapacious than all these trusts combined; a trust which levies tribute in some way upon all the people, from the babe in the cradle to the tottering and aged man or woman ready to quit life. I mean the Shipping Trust.

Conceding that the platform adopted at Baltimore declared in favor of free tolls to American ships while passing through the canal, yet we are confronted with the other overtowering question, Shall we live up to our treaty obligations?—a question far more important to our honor and integrity as a nation than any one plank adopted at the Baltimore convention. Therefore, viewing the question from the standpoint of our national honor and integrity, what is our duty? To follow out the overtowering question of redeeming our national honor, or to follow out the mandates of a plank in a platform which undertakes to commit us to a policy against which the Democratic Party has inveighed throughout all of its past history? As to me and mine I propose to take the course of upholding national honor and integrity and follow out the time-honored traditions of our party for a century, when we have opposed all special privilege and special interests of every kind.

It is conceded by those opposed to us that to permit vessels engaged in coastwise trade to pass through the canal free of tolls is a subvention. A subvention is nothing but a subsidy pure and simple, and our national platforms for more than half a century have cried out in ringing terms against subsidies. And to those who contend that we are violating the plain provisions of a written plank in the Baltimore platform I especially commend to them the reading of the planks in our platforms for the past 50 years, in which we have opposed subsidies of all kinds, and especially ship subsidy.

Whence comes this determined effort to prevent the repeal of the provisions of the Panama Canal tolls act? Special interest, and special interests alone, who seek to gain a benefit in the event they can acomplish the repeal. There is no greater monopoly in the United States to-day than what is known as the coastwise trade. It is protected by a law, and under the law they are given the exclusive right to carry their trade along our tremendous coast line. Under the law no foreign vessel can engage in this trade to the extent of carrying a single pound of freight, and under the law all this tremendous commerce is given to American vessels, and they are given the exclusive right to carry all of it. And under the law all American vessels, owned and operated by American shipowners and flying the American flag, can engage in the coastwise trade.

This being true, it would practically admit to the canal free of charge all American freight carried in American vessels. It would permit foreign vessels having sailing connections with American lines to land foreign freight in this country, reload and reship it upon American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, and send it through the canal free of charge. This being undisputed, can anyone read paragraph 1 of article 2 and contend that it would not be a discrimination against foreign nations and in favor of our own? And if this be true, it would be a positive violation of the treaty.

From an economic viewpoint the bill should become a law. The American people have bowed their backs and permitted themselves, together with unborn posterity, to have placed upon them a mortgage of $400,000,000, which will remain a debt long after the seventh generation has come and gone. To this they have meekly submitted without a protest, without a murmur, believing that the construction of the canal would eventually redound to their benefit by giving them better transportation facilities and in the end cheaper necessities of life.

The interest charge upon the $400,000,000 of bonds issued to construct the canal will be annually $12,000,000. The upkeep and maintenance of the canal will amount to $13,000,000 more per year, making a total annual charge upon the people, already overburdened with debts and taxes, of at least $25,000,000 annually. Does anyone for a moment believe that if vessels engaged in the coastwise trade were permitted to go through the canal free of charge the people would get any benefit in the way of having cheaper necessaries of life? Let no man delude himself into answering this question in the affirmative. Every dollar saved by them in free tolls would go into their own coffers.

It is estimated that the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade carrying merchandise through the canal would pay annually about $2,500,000 to its cost and upkeep. Is it not the part of wisdom from an economic viewpoint to let this money go into the Treasury of the United States to aid in paying the cost and upkeep of the canal? If this be not done, the people will be taxed this amount of money each year for its cost and maintenance.

From either viewpoint the President is right, and I am sure when the people understand the question they will applaud him as the savior of their Nation's honor. Alone he stands to-day the center of all action, the cynosure of all eyes, undismayed and unswerved from doing his duty, and meting out equal and exact justice, not only to our own grateful Nation, but to every nation beneath the sun. Neither the pitiless lash of merciless newspapers nor demagogic arguments of severe critics can terrify or startle him. Well should he be denominated "the iron duke of the twentieth century." He will, in the course of time, be hailed the savior of the Nation's honor, the upholder of the eternal laws of righteousness, honor, and integrity.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, this measure involves consideration from two standpoints. First, it is a national domestic question, and, second, an international or foreign question. With reference to the domestic side of the question, allow me to say that I think it has been much exaggerated. The enemies of the party have seized upon the differences that exist among Members, and an unfriendly press and all the other matters that enter into such controversies and have made it seemingly of very much more importance than it is. Let us see. Independent of other questions, and looking at it from the cold standpoint of dollars and cents, to the people the situation is simply this: We have built the Panama Canal and propose that the ships which go through it shall be charged enough to meet the fixed charges and operating expenses of the canal. The free-toll proposition proposes that our domestic vessels engaged in the coastwise trade shall pay no tolls, and the argument to sustain that view is that it will increase competition with the transcontinental railroads and thereby benefit the people. But I suggest that the Interstate Commerce Commission has power to fix rates across the continent, and they can take into consideration all the facts in fixing the rates and the people will get the benefit. I suggest, further, that it is a simple question, and this free-toll business is being used by the Republican Party to "toll" the Democrats away from their party allegiance.

Looking at it from the international standpoint, the question becomes much more serious. Everyone knows, and I need not call attention to the fact, that we are in a delicate position internationally, with Mexico, the Japanese question on the Pacific coast, and the Philippine question. In a word, our whole international relations are rather shaken. That is the simple truth, and hence it behooves us, as a great power, to proceed fairly. It is true that we own the Panama Canal. It is true we built it with our money. It is a great American enterprise, of which we are all proud, but it is equally true that it was built in pursuance of treaty obligations. First, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was entered into the 18th day of November, 1901, which took the place of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was entered into the 19th day of April, 1850, and the treaty with the Republic of Panama, which was entered into the 18th day of November, 1903, and which expressly stipulates in article 18:

> The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

And section 1, article 3, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

And this inclines me to think that the President is right when he says in his address of March 5, 1914:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

Nor do I share in the popular view of the Baltimore platform. It expressly favors toll exemption, but how it got into the platform is now immaterial. It is there, but what of it? I am a Democrat, and I believe in being bound by platforms, but platforms can say things and make demands that I can not support. Let us see: Suppose the platform had declared that the party favored the creation of the title and office of the Count of Panama as a reward to Col. Goethals for his service in its construction. Would any Democrat be bound by such a declaration in the face of the Constitution, which provides that "no titles of nobility shall be granted"? (Sec. 9, Art. VII of the Constitution.) The Constitution by Article VI provides that—

> All treaties made or which shall be made in pursuance thereof under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

And, hence, no party by its platform can bind a Member of Congress who has taken an oath to support the Constitution, to vote in violation of a treaty legally entered into. The Democratic Party is the party of the Constitution, and the maxim is as old as Democratic history: "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," and this is no less applicable to international relations than it is to our domestic affairs, and mature reflection forces me in obedience to this maxim to support this bill. I regret more than I can express that this question has been used as a vehicle for saying much that I do not think necessary and that I do not agree with. I yield to no man in admiration of the character and capacity of the Speaker of this House, and the majority leader of my party, and I have no unkind word to say to either, and I have no toleration or respect for any unkind saying that reflects upon either one of them. I would have Democrats remember that success was due more to their efforts, their organization, and their tactful management than to all else besides. Let us discuss this matter in a fair, friendly way, without imputing motives that are improper, and without any unkindness to anybody. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the pending bill because I am opposed to subsidies. I am in favor of the bill because I am opposed to taxing all of the American people in order to put dividends into the pockets of a few stockholders of the coastwise shipping monopoly. This bill shall have my support for the further reason that I am a firm believer that parties to a contract, whether individuals or groups of individuals, should faithfully observe the terms of such contract. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty constitutes a solemn agreement between the United States and Great Britain by which the United States agrees not to discriminate in regard to charges for the passage of ships through the canal, and that all nations should be treated exactly alike in this respect.

The language of the treaty in regard to the matter of charges or tolls of traffic seems to me to be unequivocal, and it is only by distorting the meaning thereof that any doubt could arise. Section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is in the following language:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If the canal is to be open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, then the exemption of United States ships engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls would seem to be a violation of the treaty. Certainly such a provision of law would not be leaving the canal open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality. The words "all nations" surely mean all nations of the world, and no one has yet argued that the United States is not a Nation. But it is argued that this would prevent the United States from using the canal to its particular advantage during times of war between it and some other nation. If the treaty or contract by its terms prevents the United States from obtaining an advantage in the use of the canal during times of war, no honorable man should undertake to read into the treaty language the purpose of which is to escape from such a difficulty. If the treaty restricts the United States Government in its use of the canal during the time of war as well as in time of peace, then that should be conclusive to the mind of any honest man. To contend for anything else means simply that we propose to violate our treaties because we have the power to do so.

But I do not think that the terms of the treaty limit the United States in regard to the use of the canal by its warships in the same way in which the language before referred to defines the terms of its use commercially. Section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty was specifically made a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That section provides that both the United States and Great Britain would extend their protection to any means of communication across the Isthmus, whether by canal or railway. It also states that it is the understanding that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic than the two Governments in question shall approve as just and equitable. It is apparent, therefore, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated the construction, or, at least, joint protection, of the canal by the United States and Great Britain. But article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty specifically provides that the canal may be constructed either directly by the United States Government or by individuals approved by the United States Government, and that the United States shall have the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. This language modifies section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. But the opponents of the pending bill argue that since section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty says—that the words "observing these rules" limit the use of the canal by the warships of the United States in the same manner as its use by citizens of the United States for commercial purposes is limited—that is, on terms of equality. The fallacy of this argument lies in the fact that it assumes that unless the Government of the United States is compelled to observe all of the rules, under all conditions, it is therefore not comprehended in the term "all nations." But, as we have pointed out, article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that the United States shall enjoy all rights incident to the construction of the canal as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of it. Certainly it would not require a violent twisting of the English language to argue that this language gives the United States full right to use any means whatever to protect its property at Panama in case of war with Great Britain.

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules—

It must be remembered that the political or sovereign rights of the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are entirely different from its right to regulate the use of the canal for a commercial purpose.

Oh, but our Republican friends say, whatever the treaty may say, the Democratic Party is bound by its platform to permit American coastwise ships to pass free through the canal. In the first place, the Democratic platform itself is contradictory on this point. One section embodies the following language:

> We believe in fostering by constitutional regulation the growth of a merchant marine, which develops and strengthens the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

If we fail to repeal the free-tolls law, are we not imposing additional burdens upon the people? Are we not granting bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury? The language of the Democratic platform just quoted expresses long-established Democratic doctrine, and, what is better still, it really constitutes fundamental democracy. The paragraph in the Democratic platform for which our opponents are so solicitous is as follows:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

This is unquestionably a very clear statement, but it nevertheless is in flat contradiction of the antisubsidy section which I have already quoted. That being true, what is the duty of a Democratic Member of Congress? Clearly, it seems to me, his duty is to do what is right; to support that one of the contradictory provisions which is in harmony with long-established Democratic principles, which is consistent with our contract entered into with Great Britain, which is consistent with the Jeffersonian principle of equal rights to all and special privileges to none, and which prevents the taxation of all of the American people for the purpose of paying the cost of transporting the vessels of the coastwise shipping monopoly.

But what if the antisubsidy plank were not in the Democratic platform? I still insist that it would be the duty of every Democrat who is opposed to subsidy to vote for the pending bill. In the first place, the tolls-exemption plank was slipped into the platform with hardly anyone else than the framer of the plank knowing anything about it. It was little discussed during the campaign, and the people as a whole unquestionably voted without having the matter in mind. I yield to no man in my adherence to a solemn promise, but when I am confronted with a situation like the present one, where the party platform is contradictory, where there is no doubt as to which plank is right in principle, where no candid man can doubt the meaning of the treaty—the contract—between this country and Great Britain, I find no difficulty in deciding what is my duty. I believe the great mass of the American people are opposed to special privilege of any kind. I believe that they are anxious to carry out their solemn contract and are opposed to having their country break its bargain with any person or any nation. I do not believe my constituents would have me do, as their agent, what they would not do themselves if here, and I do not believe that the people of my district, if voting in this Chamber, would deliberately vote to break their own bargain with Great Britain or any other nation. When men speak of national honor I say to them that the highest kind of national honor consists in doing what we agreed to do. That being true, it is my duty, as I see it, to disregard the likelihood of some people forgetting the meaning of a solemn treaty, but harping upon an accidental plank of a platform and voicing their disapproval at the polls at the first opportunity. I have no such fear, however, for I believe that the American people generally prefer to do what is right rather than what perhaps might be expedient.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in May, 1912, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, a majority of the committee being Democrats, presented a bill to this House relating to the Panama Canal. One of the provisions of the bill was in regard to charging tolls on vessels passing through the canal, and it provided that each vessel should pay toll on its cargo.

The bill was amended by providing that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States." This amendment was placed on the bill by the combined vote of a minority vote of the Democrats and the Republicans. A majority of the Democrats voted against it.

About one month later the national Democratic convention met at Baltimore, and when the platform was written it contained a clause favoring this exemption. Afterwards the Senate passed the bill as amended and it became law.

On March 5, this year, President Wilson delivered a message on this subject before a joint session of the Senate and House. He said in part:

> I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.
> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

FOLLOWING THE PRESIDENT.

Those of us who agree with the President that the exemption should be repealed have been held up to scorn, have been accused of being "rubber-stamp" Congressmen, and it has been said that we are obeying the behest of the President like a gang of children carrying out the order of a schoolmaster.

These statements are absolutely false and untrue so far as I am concerned. Before Mr. Wilson was even nominated by the Democratic Party as its candidate for the Presidency I had taken my position on the subject and had voted against the exemption. My record had been made, and my position is unchanged. It is unchanged not because I have a morbid desire to be consistent, but because I thought when that vote was cast that I was right, and still think so.

President Wilson says, "In my judgment, very carefully considered and maturely formed," a mistake was made; therefore he agrees that the position occupied by me and a majority of the Democrats of the House is the correct position. It is indeed gratifying to have the President of the United States, big brained, well informed, patriotic as he is, agree that my judgment, expressed two years ago, is right in this matter.

PLATFORM PLEDGES.

Platform pledges are not to be lightly disregarded. It is right that they should be carried out absolutely and unequivocally, unless it is shown beyond all doubt that a mistake has been made. When such a condition exists, the manly, the honest, the wise, the statesmanlike thing to do is to acknowledge the mistake, get right, and correct it.

Whenever a platform pledge is broken it is always charged that the party elected on that platform has obtained office by false pretenses.

In this instance no such charge can be successfully made. While it is true that the Democratic platform did announce in favor of "free tolls," this was not an important issue in the campaign. Really, it was not an issue at all. The Democratic Party did not win the election because of that pronouncement. It is probably true that not a single vote was gained to our party by it. It is certainly true that the election was not won by it and, in fact, that it contributed in no wise to Democratic success. Tariff reform, banking and currency, the trusts, rural credits, the income tax, and so forth, were the questions that were engaging the public mind, and it was our position on these subjects that brought victory to our party.

CONTRADICTIONS IN THE PLATFORM.

Under the heading "Merchant marine" the following language is used in the platform of 1912:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Another paragraph under the same heading is as follows:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

These two paragraphs are in the same plank. The first paragraph is the announcement of a political principle that Democrats have held to for many, many years. The second paragraph announces a departure from Democratic doctrine, and is in direct and distinct contradiction of the first.

That being true, it is absolutely impossible for us to stand by both of them. Whether we vote for tolls or no tolls, we repudiate one or the other of the paragraphs quoted.

A vote for tolls is a vote against a subsidy, and it is a repudiation of the second paragraph.

A vote for "free tolls" is a vote for a subsidy, and it is a repudiation of the first paragraph.

Thus we see that there is repudiation no matter which way we turn. There is no escape from this conclusion. We must choose between the two. For my part, I shall stand by that political doctrine that the Democratic Party has proclaimed so long. I shall heed the admonition of scripture, "Remove not the ancient landmark."

"A man can not serve two masters"; neither can he stand by both declarations of the platform. As I have said, those who vote against tolls, as well as those who vote for tolls, repudiate a part of the platform. Each is guilty of repudiation, but each is not equally guilty; there is a difference in the degree of the offense.

Those who violate the first paragraph and stand by the second are more guilty, because they repudiate a Democratic doctrine and vote for a subsidy, which is a Republican doctrine. Opposition to subsidies and favoring free tolls are as widely separated as the East from the West—as the Democratic from the Republican Party.

It is unfortunate that this condition confronts us, but we must meet it honestly and fearlessly, each one deciding for himself what is right in the matter.

SOME HARSH PHRASES.

The advocates of "free tolls" have several pet phrases that they love to sound in the ears of those who oppose them. Some of these are "un-American," "surrender to England," "traitor to America," "coward."

None of these phrases excite, terrify, or swerve me from doing what I believe to be right about this matter. The reason for my refusal to be affected by such language is that, from my viewpoint, it is unjustly applied and is, in fact, untrue.

In what way is our action "un-American"?

Is it "un-American" to oppose subsidies? It at least is not un-Democratic to do so, as appears from the national platform of the Democratic Party for many years.

Is it "un-American" to protect the masses of the people against unjust discriminations in the interest of a few shipowners and great corporations? I do not believe that it is. It certainly is not un-Democratic, if my understanding of Democracy is correct. "Special privileges to none" has been a cardinal doctrine of Democracy for more than a century.

"Surrender to England!" What do we surrender? The canal still belongs to us; we will use it just as we will, if free tolls are granted; we will continue to fix toll rates that England must pay; every right that we have now will remain with us. England will get no greater right in the canal and no greater use of it if we repeal this bill. Our sovereignty over the canal will remain unaffected.

Some of the advocates of free tolls say that it would be better if the canal had never been built than to turn it over to England or any other foreign nation. I would say that, too, if it were to be turned over to some other country; but no such thing is proposed, no such thing will be done. Every right of the United States will be preserved.

"Surrender to England!" This is an old bogie man. It is the argument of the Republicans every time an effort is made to relieve the people against oppressive and iniquitous tariff legislation. Since I have been in Congress I have heard this cry uttered a thousand times when the Democrats were trying to reduce the tariff, "You are throwing our markets open to the world; you are surrendering to foreign nations that which belongs to American citizens."

"Surrender to England!" This is a cry of the jingo. It is an effort to bolster up an illogical and undemocratic position by a false alarm, by an appeal to prejudices.

"Surrender to England!" This is an artful sophistry. It presumes that it is fair and just to grant "free tolls"; it presumes that to do so is not a discrimination, and that it is not a "special privilege" in favor of the shipowners and against the interests of the whole people.

If to grant the exemption would not be unjust and unfair, if it would not be a "special privilege," and if it would be to the interest of our people, and, under these circumstances, we were to charge tolls because some other nation desired us to do so, then it would be a surrender.

The argument is based on false premises. The assumption that the exemption is fair and just, that it is not a "special privilege," is unwarranted and in direct contradiction of the facts, as I shall show when I come to the discussion of subsidies.

Again, it is charged if we repeal the law that we are "cowards." Is it cowardice to stand by honest convictions? Is it cowardice to live up to the ancient Democratic faith? Is it cowardice to be true to what we honestly conceive to be the best interests of the people? I do not believe it is.

The advocates of this subsidy shout that "we are not a race of cowards"; that "we have never surrendered and will not surrender now"; that "we should remember the words of Pinckney, 'millions for defense but not one cent for tribute.'" This is not argument. It is not involved in the question. It is simply an effort to becloud the issue and draw us away from the merits of the controversy.

Just as the mother bird flutters away trying to attract attention to herself and away from her young, so are the advocates of free tolls trying to attract attention away from the iniquities of the exemption and the wrong that is being done our people. That kind of argument may catch the unthinking. Those who are capable of studying a proposition, who can look it squarely in the face, will see through the haze of bombast and loud assertion the speciousness of the argument, and they will refuse to be caught by such claptrap argument.

It is true that we are not cowards; it is true that we have never surrendered; it is as true now as it was a century ago that we will not pay tribute, and that we would risk all for honor's sake; but this does not prove that the exemption is not a subsidy. That kind of argument is just as foreign to this controversy as is the question, Did Perry or Cook reach the North Pole first?

Such assertions, no matter how loudly proclaimed nor how often repeated, will never convince the American people that President Wilson, William Jennings Bryan, and hundreds of thousands of Democrats who stand with them in this matter are either cowards or traitors to their country. Some may differ with them—may question their judgment in this matter—but few will declare them dishonest, corrupt, or unpatriotic.

DISCUSSION SHOULD BE ON HIGHER PLANE.

This discussion should be upon a higher plane than that of vulgar epithet, insulting phrases, or questioning the motives of persons on either side of the matter.

When we who advocate the repeal of this law have such language as that quoted above applied to us we could, if we desired to bandy words and not argue the merits of the question, reply that our assailants have willfully taken up their abode with the grafters and have deliberately betrayed the people for the benefit of a "special interest."

I shall make no such charge against them. I am willing to grant to those who differ from me the same honesty of opinion, the same courage, the same patriotism, the same feeling of interest for the people, the same love of national honor that I claim for myself, but deny that they possess those sentiments in any higher degree than I do.

Mr. Speaker, I decided a long time ago that I am not the only honest man in the world. A good lesson for some people to learn is this: Men should be able to differ on great questions without believing that those from whom they differ are traitors, scoundrels, or imbeciles.

Whenever a man begins to abuse those who differ from him, instead of arguing the merits of the proposition, it clearly indicates one of two things, or both—first, the weakness of his position, or second, that if his proposition has any strength, he has been unable to understand it; or, I might add, it may indicate that his disposition is such that it gives him genuine pleasure to criticize, abuse, and villify his fellow man.

THE TREATY.

For a long time there had been discussion in reference to constructing an Isthmian Canal. The territory through which the canal was to be built did not belong to the United States, so several efforts were made looking to a treaty on the subject authorizing the United States to build it.

In 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was negotiated. Article 8 of that treaty is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communication, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America; and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engaged to afford.

In 1901 the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and refers to article 8 above, was ratified. It reads as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States—John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America.

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

In 1912 Congress passed a law providing that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States."

It is this provision of law that President Wilson asks us to repeal. One reason advanced by him for repeal is that it is "in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal."

If the President is correct in his conclusion that the law is in "contravention of the treaty," it necessarily follows that the law should be repealed. A treaty between nations is just like a contract between individuals. If a bad bargain has been made, that does not authorize a failure to comply with its terms. National honor demands that its terms shall not be broken.

Many splendid speeches have been made during this debate. There is a wide difference of opinion as to whether the terms of the treaty have been violated. Much legal learning has been displayed on both sides of the proposition.

I shall not attempt to construe the treaty nor enter into a discussion of the legal questions involved. From my viewpoint it is entirely unnecessary to do so, as my position is based upon an entirely different consideration.

The construction of the treaty, the question as to whether we have or do not have the right to exempt from the payment of tolls the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, does not weigh as much as a feather with me.

What I am interested in is this: What is for the best interest of the American people? Believing that it is to their interest to charge tolls, I would vote to repeal this act if the treaty had never been in existence, or if it were to be wiped out of existence to-day.

SUBSIDIES.

I am opposed to this exemption because it grants a subsidy—a special privilege to a few rich corporations.

From time immemorial the Democratic Party has opposed subsidies and special privileges. "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none" is a principle that has been more often proclaimed by Democratic orators than any other. I am unwilling to repudiate this just principle.

Some of the advocates of free tolls deny that it is a subsidy. Let us examine and see. A subsidy is taking money out of the Public Treasury and giving it to a private enterprise.

But they say no money is taken out of the Treasury and given any private enterprise; therefore it can not be a subsidy. Granting that argument for a moment. I suggest that it is absolutely immaterial whether money is taken out of the Treasury or whether these shipowners are relieved from paying into the Treasury what they should pay. The effect is the same. In either case it is a loss of money to the public.

If the Government should say, "Mr. Shipowner, you must pay a toll of $1 and I will repay the dollar to you," that would be a subsidy. It is no less a subsidy for the Government to say, "Mr. Shipowner, it costs me a great deal to put your ship through the canal, but you can go through free. I will pay this for you."

There can be no question about this exemption from tolls being a subsidy in the most highly technical sense. Money is actually paid out of the Public Treasury for the direct use and benefit of these shipowners. It costs several thousands of dollars to put one of these vessels through the canal. It is not like sailing on a river or an ocean. Operating the locks is expensive. The Government bears this expense—the shipowner is relieved of the expense by the Government—therefore money is actually paid out of public funds for a private enterprise.

Some Democrats, realizing that subsidies are undemocratic, shy at the word "subsidy." They prefer to call it a "subvention," or other high-sounding name. They can not get away from the proposition that it has all the earmarks of a subsidy, all the effects of a subsidy, and is a special privilege. The name by which it is called is not important; what interests us is its effect. A piece of limberger cheese by any other name would be just as odoriferous.

Other advocates of free tolls are more frank about the matter, and admit that it is a subsidy. For instance, Senator GALLINGER, an ardent supporter of free tolls, admits this. He has spent many years of his life in the Senate, and is one of the strongest men in that body. He favors subsidies, and does not hesitate to let the fact be known.

In a recent controversy in the Senate between him and Senator OWEN, this language was used:

Mr. OWEN. The Senator, of course, will concede that the remission of tolls is the same thing as a subsidy, will he not?
Mr. GALLINGER. Why, it is exactly the same.

THE COASTWISE TRADE.

Under the law none but vessels belonging to citizens of the United States can engage in the coastwise trade. Not a pound of freight nor a single passenger can be carried from any port of the United States to another except by one of these vessels. If a foreign vessel were willing to carry freight for one-half the rate charged by the American vessel, it would not be allowed to do so.

This gives the American shipowners the opportunity to fix highly exorbitant freight rates. It gives a monopoly of the business to a few. This is a splendid arrangement for the American shipowner, but it is a pretty hard proposition for the other American citizens.

That this monopoly is used for selfish purposes is indisputable. The charge for carrying freight from coast to coast is from 15 to 25 per cent higher than is the charge for carrying freight to foreign ports.

In other words, if goods are shipped from New York to San Francisco the freight charge is higher than when goods are shipped to China. Thus, there is a discrimination against the American citizen in favor of the foreigner. This is due to the fact that the coastwise trade is a monopoly, while the foreign shipping is open to the competition of American, English, and all other foreign vessels.

The law even discriminates between the two classes of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States; that is, vessels engaged in coastwise-trade shipping and vessels engaged in foreign shipping. Those of the first class are granted a monopoly, while those of the second class have to compete with the vessels of the world.

The shipowners engaged in the coastwise trade are not satisfied with this immense advantage, but they ask for more. Greed ever asks for more; selfishness fattens upon itself; so they now demand free tolls in order that they may have larger profits.

WHO OWNS VESSELS ENGAGED IN COASTWISE TRADE?

Practically every vessel engaged in this trade belongs to a railroad company, the Standard Oil Co., the Steel Trust, or the United Trust Co. So this business is in the hands of the railroads or a shipping trust.

These great corporations enjoy a monopoly of this business because of a policy of governmental favoritism. These are the ones that we are asked to grant further privileges—to subsidize.

It is the trust, the monopolist, the corporation that owns these vessels. Less than 1 per cent of the people own an interest in these ships.

Yet an expression that the exemptionists have used very frequently in this debate is "our ships." They speak of these ships as if they belonged to the people. They are not "our ships"; they belong to rich and powerful corporations.

Would you say "our railroads," or "our banks," or "our mercantile establishments," or "our Beef Trust," or "our Standard Oil Co."? Certainly not; because they do not belong to the people as a whole, but to those who invested their money in them.

It is proper to say "our canal," because we, the people, built it. Because it is "ours" is the very reason that these rich shipowners should pay tolls. We, the people, paid for the canal, and now these corporations want us to pay all the expense of maintenance and operation and give them the free use of it. This is exactly in line with the spirit of the trust magnate and the monopolist.

FREE TOLLS WOULD NOT REDUCE FREIGHT RATES.

One of the arguments advanced for free tolls is that it brings water rates in competition with railroad rates, and that it will cause the railroads to reduce theirs and thereby benefit the whole people.

This is the veriest rot. It will have no such effect. At the present time there is a very wide margin of difference between water rates and railroad rates. The charge for carrying a ton of freight from Pittsburgh to San Francisco by rail is $29.40. The charge between the same points by water, where the vessel goes several thousand miles farther than it will have to travel when the canal is completed, is only $14.28. This is a difference of $15.12, or over 100 per cent less in favor of the water rate.

The proposed toll will be about $1.20 per net register ton. A net register ton does not mean a freight ton, but it is based on cubic-foot space. It is estimated by those familiar with such matters that this will amount to about 50 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds.

The fact is that a further reduction of 50 cents per ton will not cause a reduction of railroad rates if the wide margin of difference of more than $15 has not caused such reduction.

The present coastwise laws give a monopoly to these vessels. Shall we give them further benefits? The thing that interests these shipowners most is the law that gives them that monopoly. I favor the repeal of those laws.

Mr. Dearborn, president of the American-Hawaiian Line, said before the committee:

If you will only keep your coastwise laws, and do not repeal those, we do not care anything about the tolls. We can pay the tolls. It is a small matter, and we are willing to pay it, and we can do so and then compete with any rates the transcontinental railroads can make in this country.

He was honest enough to say that the shipowners ought not to be protected any further. If they can pay tolls and then compete with the railroads, it goes without saying that to give them free tolls would simply be giving them that many dollars.

THE CONSUMER WOULD NOT PROFIT.

As I have said, the ship companies would profit to the amount of the toll that is remitted. The freight that makes up the coastwise trade is very small when compared with the amount of freight in the Nation. The railroads could afford to surrender the entire coastwise business to the ships rather than reduce their rates on this class of business if they would be required to reduce rates on interior business on the theory of a long-and-short haul. Consequently there would be no benefit to points off the coast.

But suppose the shipowner was generous enough to reduce his rate 50 cents per ton; it would not go to the consumer. How many private individuals would have freight shipped from coast to coast? This reduction, if given, would go to the wholesaler. Could he distribute it among his customers? Assuredly he could not, because the amount is so small.

Remember the toll will be 50 cents per ton, or 2½ cents per hundred pounds. If shoes weighing a pound per pair were shipped, the toll would be one-fortieth of a cent per pair. If the shoes were worth $2.50 per pair, you would have to buy $100 worth to get the benefit of a cent. If it was meat, you would have to buy 40 pounds to get the benefit of 1 cent on the whole transaction. If it is oranges, lemons, and the like, you would have to purchase many dozen and invest several dollars to get the benefit.

The illustrations are used to show how ridiculous the argument is that the ultimate consumer will benefit.

The amount involved in each particular transaction is so small that the consumer can not possibly benefit by it, but in the aggregate it means giving the shipowners at least $1,250,000.

The canal has cost us about $400,000,000, and it will cost about $27,000,000 each year to pay interest on bonds and operating expenses. The people will have to be taxed to pay this amount. It is right to make those who use the canal pay a part, at least, of this tax.

Suppose some enterprising member of a State legislature should say to himself: "Taxes are a part of the expenses of a railroad company and are figured in whenever rates are based on the expense of operation and a reasonable profit; therefore I will introduce a bill to exempt railroads from taxation." Does anyone doubt what the fate of his bill would be, or that the author of the bill would be considered either insane or an enemy to the public?

Everyone who borrows money wants it at as low rate of interest as possible. But no one would be willing to relieve banks from taxation, because everyone knows that the reduction of expense would not relieve the borrower.

If a county were to build a bridge and charge tolls for passing over it, and the board of supervisors should exempt every man from the payment of toll who owned an automobile, or should exempt from payment of tolls every man who was worth $50,000, the members of the board would be in danger of being lynched. Yet this is practically what is being done by an exemption from toll, because the wealthy corporations are the only ones who benefit by exemptions.

CAN NOT EXPECT GENEROSITY FROM SHIPPING TRUST.

The history of trusts, combines, and monopolies has not been such as to inspire the people to believe that they operate their business for the benefit of the masses of the people. They have never done so; they will not do so in this matter.

> You may as well go stand upon the beach
> And bid the main flood bate its usual height;
> You may as well use question with the wolf
> Why he hath made the ewe bleat for the lamb.
> You may as well forbid the mountain pines
> To wag their high tops and make no noise
> When they are fretten with the gusts of heaven.
> You may as well do anything most hard—as to ask these gigantic, soulless corporations to give to the people the benefit of this toll charge.

It is the same old spirit of selfishness and greed that has existed since the earth was young. It is the same old demand of the rich for special privilege. More than 300 years ago Sir Thomas Moore, in describing the conditions of his country, rather aptly described some of the conditions of our day. He said:

> The rich are ever striving to pare away something further from the daily wage of the poor, by private fraud, and even by public laws, so that the wrong already existing—for it is a wrong that those from whom the State denies most benefit should receive least reward—is made yet greater by means of the law of the State. * * * As soon as the rich decide on adopting these devices in the name of the public, then they become law.
> CONCLUSION.

I shall vote to repeal this exemption because it is, as the President so well said, an—

> Economically unsound policy, because it is unfair and unjust; because it grants a special privilege to a small class, and is therefore undemocratic; because it will not help the masses of the people, but will place an additional burden upon them.

To build this canal and keep it up for the benefit of these great corporations appears to me to be like spreading a great feast for the rich, the shipowners, and denying even the crumbs that fall from the table to the poor, the masses of the people.

There are too many who are willing to have a moneyed aristocracy, to promote the interest of the few at the expense of the many, to reproduce here some methods that have controlled foreign countries, with the conditions that naturally follow—a few rich and many impoverished and homeless. God forbid that I shall vote to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with any man who sees proper to vote different from the way I do, but my convictions on this matter are so strong that it is impossible for me to vote any other way than for repeal.

[Mr. ELDER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. SPARKMAN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. POST addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the Sixty-second Congress, I gave the question of the Panama Canal tolls a great deal of attention and study.

After many weeks of hearings and investigation on the part of our committee, having the benefit of the evidence of great students of economical problems and questions of transportation, as well as the views of some of the greatest international lawyers and experts on treaties, together with 15 of the 21 members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I came to the conclusion that giving the coastwise vessels, which already enjoyed every protection from foreign competition, a subsidy in the shape of free tolls through the Panama Canal would be unjustifiable and unfair to the American people in general.

The American people have without protest permitted the expenditure of nearly $400,000,000 in the construction of the canal, and I did not believe it right and equitable that they should continue to pay for the upkeep of a waterway which will inure mainly to the benefit of the owners of the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

The evidence given before the committee clearly demonstrated that the vessels in the coastwise trade which will use the Panama Canal are owned in the main by three trusts or combines, namely, the Standard Oil Co., the Steel Trust, and the Steamship Combine, and I could see no reason then, nor can I see any reason now, why any additional special privilege should be accorded these interests at the expense of the American people.

Also, after a very careful consideration of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the circumstances surrounding its ratification, I came to the inevitable conclusion that the United States was in honor bound to make no discrimination against any nation or the people of any nation.

For these reasons I voted in committee against the free-tolls proposition, and at that time the vote in the committee stood 16 to 5 against free tolls. The five gentlemen who voted in favor of free tolls represented four coastwise States which would be especially benefited.

When the bill was considered in the House in 1912 I voted again as I did in committee—against this special-privilege provision, against this ship subsidy, against free tolls. Consequently I must and I shall cast my vote at the present time in accordance with the stand which I took after careful and mature consideration two years ago, namely, on May 21, 1912.

On that day I made a few remarks on this question. I will not repeat now what I said at that time, but will insert those remarks in the RECORD. Those remarks explained my position and my vote then as well as now, and are as follows:

SPEECH OF HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH, OF ILLINOIS, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, TUESDAY, MAY 21, 1912,

On the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintaining, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, those who are not acquainted with the benefits that the coast States and the steamship companies will derive from the canal route might easily be misled by the eloquence and the pleadings of the gentlemen from California, Washington, Louisiana, and New York that the reduction of nearly 70 per cent from present freight rates, as well as materially reduced passenger rates, will work hardships upon the traffic going by the canal route. Every effort is being made to mislead people into believing that it is necessary for the maintenance of our coastwise shipping trade to grant free tolls.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any subsidy, and I am therefore obliged to be opposed to free tolls, which means, and is, notwithstanding the denial on the part of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, a subsidy.

Before the completion of the Panama Canal our Government will have expended $400,000,000 in building this great project. It will cost nearly $20,000,000 annually for operation and maintenance and military protection. And this is without taking into consideration the great sums of money that will be required from year to year for repairs, excavating, strengthening of dams, and removal of slides. Personally, I have always doubted, and doubt now, whether or not our country at large will be benefited or rewarded by this stupendous expenditure of money. But I do admit, and must confess, that the coast States, especially California, Washington, and New York, and the steamship companies will derive great benefit from this project, as it will shorten the distance between our Atlantic and Pacific ports by about 8,000 miles, thereby reducing the time and cost of transportation at least two-thirds.

At present, the average rate of freight transportation between San Francisco and New York is about $20 per ton. It has been testified by experts that this cost will be reduced about 65 per cent, which means to about $7 per ton, a net saving on each and every ton of nearly $13, and notwithstanding this great reduction there are those who are opposed to a toll of 50 cents per ton, out of which toll the Government could partially pay the operating expenses of the canal.

The only argument they advance in entertaining free tolls is that we must build up our merchant marine. If they are honest and really desire to build up our merchant marine, why did they vote against the Sims and other amendments, which provided that all vessels flying the American flag and engaged in foreign trade should be granted free tolls? Their refusal to entertain these amendments satisfies me that they are not as anxious to see the American flag upon the seas as they would make us believe, and they must have other reasons for their insistence upon giving the steamship combine free access to the Panama Canal route.

This steamship combination is to-day, and has been for years, enjoying an absolute monopoly of all coastwise trade, and it is for this steamship-railroad-owned combination that these gentlemen from California, Washington, and New York are pleading when they urge free tolls.

I am of the opinion that it should be our solemn duty to legislate in the interests of the entire people of this country, and not for any certain district, section, or special interest. This is something that the gentlemen from the States I have mentioned seem to have forgotten. Invariably the majority of those who advocate free tolls are heard upon this floor pleading for special legislation, for special districts, special sections of the country, and frequently for special interests; therefore, I am not at all surprised at their present attitude. Personally, I do not believe in taxing the people of the entire country for the interests of a small section, and especially when even that small section will derive only one-third of the benefit from the desired legislation, as the greater portion will surely remain with the steamship combination.

Some of these gentlemen desire to know who demands that tolls be charged, proclaiming loudly that they have not heard from a single city, a single organization, or a single person, asking that tolls be charged. That may be true, but they did not inform us of the names of the gentlemen, companies, and corporations that have made demands for free tolls, nor have they given the names of the large number of lobbyists who have been working night and day for free tolls.

The people of the United States, who elected us, have a right to believe that without any special requests, appeals, or demands we will do our duty toward them, and it should therefore be unnecessary for them to hold special meetings, appoint special committees, and delegate special lobbyists to show us how to vote on questions of justice and righteousness.

Mr. Speaker, section 11 of this bill provides that no railroad-owned vessels shall be permitted the use of the canal, and, inasmuch as nearly all of the vessels engaged in our coastwise trade are owned or controlled by the railroads, it will therefore be necessary for the railroads to part with this ownership and control in order that the canal may be opened to such vessels. We can easily perceive the reasons for the anxiety from certain quarters to give free tolls. With this special privilege the railroads can easily demonstrate greater earning power for all such vessels, and they accordingly can demand, and will receive, a much more advantageous price for these vessels from purchasers than they would if the bill provided for tolls.

No one on this floor has been bold enough to claim that vessels engaged in our coastwise trade need any additional governmental aid. I feel confident that there can be no one so bold as to maintain that all these coastwise vessels are not operating at the present time at a fair profit, because the contrary is true.

Evidence produced before our committee on this subject showed clearly that all of the companies in the coastwise trade are prosperous and have been paying fair dividends and have increased their number of ships annually. They have been buying out new companies and new vessels as soon as they started to operate. But even if this were not so, should our other industries be called on to maintain and aid an industry that can not maintain itself? I say, and every honest American will say, "No." We have had our sad and costly experience in aiding and assisting our so-called infant industries, that are in reality leviathans, now grasping the greater part of the wealth of our country, like the tentacles of an octopus. If I thought that our country was in danger, or even in need, I would not hesitate a moment to vote for any measure to build up or purchase an auxiliary to our Navy that the united powers of the world could not successfully combat. But, Mr. Chairman, we have to-day, notwithstanding the views and cries of certain gentlemen and the fears expressed by others, enough vessels flying the American flag that can be converted into auxiliaries to our Navy to transport all the men, all the coal, and all the provisions necessary if our Army were enlarged fourfold over its present strength.

The evidence of one gentleman, who represented two companies, showed that they alone owned more than 75 vessels, each one over 3,000 tons capacity, flying our flag, that could be turned into colliers and Army transports in no time. Personally I hope and trust that it will never be necessary for this Nation to have need for an enlarged Army or an auxiliary thereto.

I maintain and am of the firm opinion that our country has done enough for navigation and commerce when we have expended the stupendous sum of $400,000,000, more than $1,000,000 for each and every congressional district in the United States, in building this great canal. It comes with mighty poor grace for the gentlemen who represent those States which will receive the greatest benefit from this great project to insist that the people of each congressional district shall be taxed over $90,000 annually to maintain and operate the canal for the benefit of a few, who will be the actual beneficiaries. I have been and am now and I shall continue to be against that proposition, believing that the least the beneficiaries of this project can do is pay the small toll of 50 cents per ton, which will not be enough to pay even the actual operating expense of taking vessels through the canal, to say nothing of the cost of maintenance and the interest on the vast sum that we will expend in completing this great undertaking.

Up to now I have said nothing about the treaty under which the canal is being constructed, and I will not at this time say whether or not this country has the right under this treaty to discriminate against foreign vessels. I believe that every Member of this House is capable of construing the treaty without any aid and assistance from me, but I do desire to refresh the minds of some of the Members, and I will, therefore, read article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and such charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

I direct your attention to this provision of the treaty for the reason that I believe that it is the duty of each and every nation to honestly and fairly live up to any agreement entered into by it, and that we are not in a position to create still further resentment against this Nation than already exists within our neighboring countries. I deem it the duty of this Democratic Congress to bring about better and friendlier feelings with other nations that at present exists, and demonstrate to the foreign nations that we believe in keeping our faith and at all times to deal honorably and fairly with them.

Only through the following out of such a course can we ever expect to again attain the reputation that was ours for more than 100 years, which reputation, however, has suffered a great deal at the hands of the last two Republican administrations. Our country is great enough to be magnanimous, and give the benefit of the doubt, if any exists, to those whose commerce, trade, and friendship, I am sure, we desire.

Mr. HAMILL. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who voted to exempt American coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal, but I will vote in favor of this bill to repeal that exemption.

The purpose of this measure is to put on terms of absolute equality, in respect to the payment of tolls, all vessels passing through the Panama Canal. If it is enacted into law, all vessels—foreign and domestic alike—must contribute to the cost of maintaining the great waterway.

I believe the bill ought to be passed and passed without delay. I do not intend to consider whether under a construction of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have or have not the right to exempt American coastwise vessels. Very eminent authority can be found to sustain either side of the proposition, and, moreover, a discussion of this phase of the question does not at all go to the heart of the matter in issue.

The question is not how we might possibly obtain a commercial advantage, but rather what shall be our relations with the other nations of the world—shall we live with them on terms of international peace or international enmity? This is the true point at issue in the proposition to repeal the tolls-exemption clause.

On the 5th day of March the President came into this Chamber and, in concluding his special message, made the following statement:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of this administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

This means plainly that the President can not conduct the relations of this Government with other nations of the world unless this exemption is repealed. But the conduct of our foreign policy rests almost wholly upon the President. As he puts it, he is charged in a peculiar degree by the Constitution itself with personal responsibility.

This transforms the tolls issue from a national into an international question. Why quarrel, then, over a mere commercial matter when the whole foreign policy of the Government is at stake? This is not a question of mere economic policy. It has been lifted from that low level to the higher plane of international importance.

What objection can be offered to this request? Who are opposing the President in this appeal? Let us pause for a while to consider them. First and foremost we have the enemies of the administration. They are extremely willing and anxious to get behind anything which might, as they imagine, weaken Democratic rule. They are not particular whether their opposition is just or unjust, well founded or ill founded, if it can be used to injure the Wilson administration.

Then we have the Shipping Trust. This monopoly, with all its forces, is, of course, arrayed against the President. When we look at this sordid and desperate gang displaying their hostility we can not help saying of President Wilson what was said of Mr. Cleveland, "That we love him for the enemies he has made." What the shipowners want is a subsidy. They want the American people to pay them for conducting their business. They are still burning with a certain kind of patriotism as on other occasions of yore. They are still unalterably for the glorious flag, provided an appropriation goes with it. They are still at their old tricks of attempting to loot the Treasury under the guise of fostering Americanism. Now, why should we, especially we Democrats, pay a subsidy to these shipowners?

The Democratic Party has always been opposed to special privilege. The cardinal tenet of Jeffersonian doctrine is equal rights to all, special privileges to none. And if we are to give $1,000,000 or more annually to these shipowners, why not do so openly? Let us take the money out of the Treasury and pay it over directly, not attempt to pay it over in this covert and indirect way. The shipping monopoly, however, understands better than anyone else that if it paraded in true colors it would be at once discovered, and that is why it masquerades in the guise of American patriotism. This is the explanation of a great deal of the agitation which is behind this jingoistic proposition to uphold American doctrine by fattening American monopoly. The people of the country—that is, the great body of our population—are not in the least affected by this repeal, and this attempt to stir them up is only manufactured for a purpose.

The question for Democrats carefully to consider is whether they shall uphold the leadership of Woodrow Wilson or repudiate it. Shall they acknowledge him as party leader or deny him. This is precisely what a vote on this question against the President means. The President asks Congress to save him and his administration from almost insuperable difficulties in dealing with our foreign relations. To him almost exclusively in this respect the honor of the Nation is committed. His patriotism is unquestionable, and he knows whereof he speaks. He is acquainted with the real conditions that confront him, and he is not acting out of mere obstinacy or pride of opinion, but out of an earnest desire to deal properly with a most difficult situation. He solemnly assures us that a crisis has arisen in our international relations, and calls upon us for encouragement and aid. Surely an appeal from him of this character ought not to go unheeded. It is certain the President would not ask for the concession on our part if the necessity for making it were not urgent in the extreme. We would willingly vote $200,000,000 for war if he asked it. As Democrats, therefore, we are bound to follow him.

The success of the foreign policy of the administration ought to be as much a matter of solicitude to us as it is to him. We are not here to wreck the Democratic Party, but to maintain it and strengthen it. If the proper conduct of our foreign affairs can only be carried on by repeal, then by all means let us repeal. We must either vote to get the President out of this entangling situation, which he did not create, or else confess that we are plotting to humiliate and discredit him. If we recognize him as leader of the party, we ought to follow his recommendation. Let our political enemies, the Republicans and the Progressives, tear and hack at him. That is what we can reasonably expect them to do. But let no Democrat deal him a foul blow when he asks our loyal support on a matter that affects the honor and welfare of the country.

An attempt has been industriously made to inject into this question an element of race hatred. The policy of the administration has been put down as truckling to England in order to stir up against it Irish sentiment in America. Men of Irish birth and parentage are appealed to and urged to oppose the President, so as to strike a blow at England. Personally I am not disposed to give Great Britain any more than she is justly entitled to, but this is neither an English question nor an Irish question. It is an American question, pure and simple, and we are to decide it in accordance with our oaths as Members of the United States House of Representatives. It is to the United States we owe a duty and to no one else. This is not a mere agreement with Great Britain. The treaty is for the benefit of the whole world. It expressly states:

> * * * The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations * * * on terms of entire equality.

It is true, of course, that England as a great commercial nation may reap corresponding profit, because it possesses a great number of ships, but the undoubted fact remains that this is a question which affects all nations alike. Germany, France, Italy, Spain, and every other nation possessing ships is vitally interested in having the canal opened on equal terms to all, in accordance with our promise to hold it in trust for the use of the entire world. We are not truckling to anyone in this matter. Keeping good faith is never subservience, especially when, as in this case, the concession comes of its own accord from a great and powerful nation.

It is said our action will reverse a plank of the Democratic platform. This is an important objection, but it is by no means unanswerable. The platform was framed to meet conditions which were in existence or in anticipation at the time it was made. But if conditions so change as to make the platform plank inapplicable it is the right, it is the duty, of a party to disregard it. We will be judged not by a slavish adherence to the platform, but by the wisdom we manifested in solving the problems confronting the Government.

We may be charged with inconsistency in voting for this repeal after having voted in favor of exemption. This is a reproach which is easy to answer. The people of our districts sent us here to act on each occasion according to the situation we would have to deal with and to judge each matter on its own merits. It should therefore be our aim to do not merely what is consistent but rather what is right. And I, for one, am not afraid to reverse myself and take the right side if on consideration and reflection I find I have been on the wrong side. Time will demonstrate conclusively that in voting in favor of repeal we are voting right.

I could continue offering arguments for the position I assume, but I deem it unnecessary to do so. I would only repeat reasons you have heard before and bring you over ground with which you are familiar.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Woodrow Wilson has at heart the best interests of the American people. That fact has been amply demonstrated by all his actions in the past. He wants American faith to be unquestioned and unquestionable; he wants American honor to be spotless; he wants the hands of America to be clean beyond suspicion; he wants us above all to live in peace and harmony with the other nations of the earth and to deserve their admiration and affection. So far as I am able I am going to help him accomplish this laudable purpose. Therefore I will vote in favor of this meritorious bill, and I hope it will pass.

[Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, there is but one question involved in this discussion, namely, Are you for repeal or against repeal? Are you for ship subsidy or against ship subsidy? A great "hullabaloo" was sought to be raised against the adoption of the special rule, because they said that it limited debate and would not permit amendments. In all my service here I have never seen a special rule so liberal in general debate. Notwithstanding we have been in session now over a year, a large percentage of which time has been put in in talking, yet the rule allowed 23 hours of debate—certainly time enough for any man to tell whether he is in favor of ship subsidy or not; and that is all there is to this question.

I know that those who favor a subsidy try to conceal that fact by injecting other questions into the discussion. They say that our platform, adopted at Baltimore two years ago, declared in favor of free tolls for our coastwise ships. That is true; but that same platform declared, also, against all forms of subsidies, bounties, and so forth. These two declarations are diametrically conflicting, and one or the other must fall. The declaration in favor of free tolls was never in the platform of the Democratic Party before last year. How it got in there I do not know; but the declaration against subsidies has been in the Democratic platform, or a cardinal Democratic principle, for a hundred years. It has been an issue in many campaigns, and the people have sustained and approved it. The free-tolls declaration has never been an issue—there was not one man in one hundred thousand who knew it was in the platform—therefore the people have not approved it. If for no other reason, I would stand by the "no-subsidy" plank and ignore the "free-tolls" plank, for I am opposed to subsidies in whatsoever form. You can call it subvention or bounty or any other name; but do not forget that a "skunk by any other name smells just as bad."

Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this bill and thereby stand by the President; and I believe I have said enough already to justify my position, but there are other reasons why I oppose free tolls to our coastwise ships. Much has been said about our surrendering to England. This is all rot. So far as is known, England has not even asked us to repeal the toll-exemption law; but, if she had, we would not be surrendering to her in doing it. No braver act can be performed than to right a wrong. No man or nation can be called cowardly who lives up to his or its agreements. The coward is the man or nation that makes an agreement and then runs away from it.

In 1901 we entered into a solemn agreement with Great Britain, as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This is as plain to me as the English language can make it. Now, if any surrender was made to England, it was made when this treaty was signed in 1901, and was made by the Republicans, who were in control of the Government at that time. We voluntarily made this agreement; now it is up to us as an honorable Nation to keep it.

Mr. Speaker, if there was a real surrender made, it was made when we in 1912 surrendered to the Shipping Trust and passed the free-tolls law which we are now, under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, trying to correct. I voted against free tolls in 1912, and on May 17 of that year made a speech against it on this floor, so will not now go into a full discussion of the question, but of course will gladly vote against free tolls again.

I repeat that I am against a subsidy in any shape or form. Some of you who are opposed to repeal seem to have convinced yourselves that free tolls is not a subsidy. By what mental gymnastics you have reached that conclusion I can not say. However, the fact remains that free tolls, as you admit, is a direct benefit to the ships having that advantage. The undisputed evidence before the committee, when considering this tolls question in 1912, was that it would cost somebody approximately $1 a net registered ton to put a ship through that canal. This is actual cost which must be paid by some one. The evidence also showed that the average seagoing vessel would be about 7,500 net registered tons. Then, when one of these vessels is put through that canal somebody must pay $7,500. If we do not make the shipowners pay it, then we must make the people pay it by taking the money out of the Treasury. If we take the money out of the Treasury, then we are just giving to the owners of that vessel $7,500 every time they put a ship through the canal. Can anyone doubt but what that is a subsidy? It is a subsidy in the worst form, for it is an indirect, back-door, sneaking subsidy. Ever since there has been a Democratic Party we have stood against subsidies and all special privileges, and I am not now going to go back on that time-honored doctrine.

You talk of mystery surrounding the President's request for the repeal of the "free-tolls" provision of the existing canal law. Ought there to be any mystery in asking Congress to do right? Ought it to seem a thing strange to you, who oppose this bill, that President Wilson asks us to right a wrong?

It seems to me that you fellows ought to know President Wilson well enough by this time to know that he stands now and always has for what he believes is right regardless of what the other fellow thinks. The people believe in him and they are amply justified in that faith. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. FITZHENRY. Mr. Speaker, when the original Panama Canal act, of 1912, passed, containing the provision exempting American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls, a great mistake was made. A special privilege of immense value to those engaged in the trade was granted to an arrogant monopoly at a terrific cost to the American people.

ORIGINAL ACT AMENDED TO GRANT FREE TOLLS.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported the bill in the former Congress without the exemption clause. When it came up for consideration on the floor of the House the friends of the shipping interests proposed the amendment providing for the free and untaxed use of the great canal for coastwise vessels. The bill was not a party measure, and it was the source of much gratification to learn from an examination of the vote on that amendment that a great and substantial majority of the Democrats in that House voted against it. Had I been a Member of that House I would have opposed the adoption of that amendment with all my strength. However, it was adopted in May, 1912, by the House through a bipartisan coalition on the part of the Republicans and a minority of the Democratic Members.

EXEMPTION A SHIP SUBSIDY.

I am persuaded that many Democrats in the coast districts were led to support the amendment by reason of their local environments and upon the belief that such an exemption was not a subsidy. It is not easy to understand what mental gymnastics gentlemen perform to be able to reach the conclusion that such an exemption is not a subsidy. From the founding of the Government down to the passing of the act as amended the cardinal principles of the Democratic Party have been repugnant to all sorts of special privileges and subsidies.

An ingenious statesman, whom we all love and honor, has made a nice distinction between a shipping subsidy and a subvention, contending that the former is the payment of moneys out of the Public Treasury to encourage private pursuits, while the latter is the diverting of public revenues to the coffers of those engaged in the private industry sought to be encouraged without permitting them to travel through the Public Treasury. In my judgment this is a distinction without a difference, and one is just as repugnant to the Democratic doctrine as the other.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S APPEAL.

But, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has asked Congress to pass a statute which will repeal the clause exempting the coastwise shipping of the United States from the payment of tolls while passing through the Panama Canal. That request comes to us in the form of an official State paper, delivered in the presence of both Houses of Congress by the President in person. This action is requested at our hands upon a higher ground than mere party doctrine, and this assistance should be rendered the President by the Congress ungrudgingly.

In brief, the Panama Canal was constructed as the result of international negotiations invited and procured on behalf of the United States. Before a shovelful of dirt had been dug, yes, even before the United States had acquired a franchise from the Republic of Panama for the construction, operation, and maintenance of this canal, the terms on which it would be used by all commercial nations and their citizens and subjects were fixed by contract. This Nation had agreed with Great Britain for itself and all the world:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

The free-tolls provision is clearly an attempted violation of a contract which was entered into by Great Britain for itself and all other commercial nations, at our request and for our benefit. This attempt to grant a few shipowners this special privilege under these circumstances is ample ground for other nations to question our sincerity unless we correct this mistake at once.

THE PRESIDENT FINDS FOREIGN DISTRUST.

When President Wilson took charge of the affairs of the Nation and entered into the council of Governments, he immediately sensed a feeling of distrust and suspicion, by reason of our having in the original Panama Canal act sought to grant to American coastwise shipping interests this great advantage and the free and untaxed use of this great contribution to the commerce and prosperity of the world. A mere reference to our treaty obligations is all that is necessary to convince any fair and impartial mind that this suspicion and distrust of our policy on the part of the nations of the world, as evidenced by that act, are indeed well founded. The innumerable and diversified interests of the American Republic and her citizens in all parts of the world are such that an unimpeachable national honor is not only desirable but is absolutely necessary for the safety of our interests and the continued growth and prosperity of one of the greatest commercial peoples of the earth.

UNITED STATES DESIRES PEACE AND HONOR.

The American people rank high in citizenship and personal honor. As a people, our every intention and desire is to be at peace with the world and upon friendly terms with all nations. Here is a stain upon our national honor. It matters not to me whether the foreign office of any other nation called our attention to this matter or not; suffice it to say that this condition exists, and, regardless of any suggestion from anybody, I am satisfied that it is the sense of the American people that the one act which has caused our integrity as a people to be questioned anywhere should be corrected. In these days when the American Republic is at peace with all the world, with problems in the East, a barbarous condition of warfare existing at our very doors on the south and between our territory and the Canal Zone, at a time when the trade routes of the world are about to be changed, it behooves this Congress to correct the error which has been made and pass the pending measure.

THE CANAL THE DREAM OF THE AGES.

For a hundred years it has been the dream of the world and the aspiration of all the great minds of this Republic to God-speed the day when the commerce of the world might sail or steam through a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific somewhere in or about the Isthmus of Panama. During all the negotiations leading up to its construction it has always been contended, and the world has been assured, that when such a canal should be completed it should be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the commerce of all nations on terms of entire equality.

The glory of this contribution to commerce and civilization is almost enough for a single nation. In this work we have justified the tremendous sacrifices of human life and treasure of 400 years. It is the realization of the defeated ambitions of Columbus, Balboa, and Cortez; the success of American genius after the failure of the Spaniard and the French. Are we to permit this glory to be dimmed by the shameless avarice of the Shipping Trust in its efforts to retain this private advantage at the expense of our national honor?

OUR TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

On the 19th of April, 1850, this Government entered into a treaty with Great Britain, which is commonly referred to as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. At that time it was proposed to build a canal at Nicaragua. That canal, under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, was to have been constructed and protected jointly by the United States and Great Britain, and the terms and conditions of this convention were the existing law until the adoption of a later contract known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901.

The opponents of this measure seem to entirely overlook the fact that the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty expressly provides that it is made and entered into "to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries," and so forth.

Article 8 referred to in the preamble of this latter treaty, the one which binds our Government to-day, is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The following is the full text of the celebrated Hay-Pauncefote treaty as proclaimed by President Roosevelt February 22, 1902, and of which articles 1, 2, and 3 are material to the consideration of the pending bill:

Treaty between the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal. Signed at Washington, November 18, 1901; ratification advised by the Senate, December 16, 1901; ratified by the President, December 26, 1901; ratified by Great Britain, January 20, 1902; ratifications exchanged at Washington, February 21, 1902; proclaimed, February 22, 1902.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas a convention between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, was concluded and signed by their respective plenipotentiaries at the city of Washington on the 18th day of November, 1901, the original of which convention is word for word as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirious to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of his British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the Convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

And whereas the said convention has been duly ratified on both parts, and the ratification of the two Governments were exchanged in the city of Washington on the 21st day of February, 1902;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, have caused the said convention to be made public, to the end that the same and every article and clause thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 22d day of February, A. D. 1902, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and twenty-sixth.

[SEAL.] THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.

PRESENT LAW A CLEAR VIOLATION OF CONTRACT.

I do not believe it is necessary to argue the meaning of these quotations, for it is clear beyond the possibility of question that the canal contemplated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to be maintained on a basis of absolute equality to the ships of all nations and those of the citizens and subjects of all nations upon absolutely equal terms. But, it is asked, what difference would it make to Great Britain or any other nation whether the United States Government permitted the coastwise vessels of her own citizens to go through the canal free or not? A brief illustration is probably as convincing as most any argument.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF DISCRIMINATIONS.

Suppose an English merchant were competing with an American merchant for a supply of certain goods to a prospective purchaser at San Francisco. The English merchant would send his vessel from Liverpool to the Panama Canal, there he would pay the toll for his vessel, which would go through the canal, thence to San Francisco; while the American merchant would load his goods upon an American coastwise vessel, say at New York City, send that vessel through the canal without the payment of tolls to San Francisco. This would amount to a discrimination against the citizen of Great Britain in the interests of the American shipper at New York to the extent of the tolls.

Or, on the other hand, the English vessel would be required to land at an American port, transfer its cargo to an American coastwise ship, and be thus carried through the canal to San Francisco, free of toll. So that it is clear that such an arrangement would amount to a positive discrimination against the subject of Great Britain.

WOULD DESTROY "FREE LUMBER."

We have placed lumber upon the free list to cheapen material for American homes and American industry. Consider the predicament of a lumber mill loading a cargo of lumber at Vancouver for shipment to New York or New Orleans. When the ship reached the canal it would be required to pay the toll before proceeding upon its journey. On the other hand, an American lumber dealer might load his lumber upon a ship at Seattle for the same destination and it would pass through the canal under the existing law absolutely free from tolls, and this advantage would amount to a discrimination against the Canadian lumber dealer exactly to the extent of the tolls, and the public policy of this country to admit Canadian lumber to our markets absolutely free of duty would be thus frustrated and a protective duty in favor of the American lumber dealer to the extent of $1.20 per ton, by measurement, levied against Canadian lumber. This, however, is merely upon the theory that the freight rate on the English vessel from Vancouver to New York or New Orleans and the freight rate from Seattle to these same ports would be the same; but, alas, there is where the rub comes.

COASTWISE SHIPS WOULD ABSORB THE BENEFIT.

The coastwise shipping of the United States is made a monopoly by law; that is, all foreign-owned or foreign-built ships are denied the privilege of entering into our coastwise trade, and the American lumber merchant would be denied the advantage necessarily accruing to him by reason of free tolls, because in making this shipment it is a shipment from one American port to another, and he is limited in his selection of a vessel to an American made, owned, and operated vessel. There can be no competition between carriers of that kind, and the American shipowner would simply increase his freight rate so as to absorb the difference in the two shipments, due to the exemption of tolls to the American vessels going through the canal.

ONE STUPENDOUS COMBINATION.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House has recently completed an investigation of our merchant marine. That committee, through its chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], has just published and presented a most voluminous report upon this subject. It shows that in the coastwise trade there are 24,765 vessels enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade in contradistinction to the registry of those ships engaged in the foreign trade. Ten per cent of them are suitable for traffic through the canal, and are more than ample to carry the traffic. This report shows that 94 per cent of all of the Atlantic and Gulf coastwise shipping is owned directly by railroads or shipping combinations, while almost the same high percentage obtains on the Pacific.

In fact, the coastwise shipping of the United States is in such an ironclad combination that the exemption from tolls for American ships going through the canal would not redound to the interests of the people to the extent of one cent, but, on the other hand, would amount to a subsidy to the shipping combinations controlling our coastwise trade to the extent of two or three million dollars annually in the form of toll exemptions. As a constituent of a colleague of mine recently wrote him—

> If the American people had the courage to spend $400,000,000 to construct this great canal, shortening the water route from New York to San Francisco something like 8,000 miles, they certainly ought to have sense enough to make private parties who use it pay for that privilege.

WE COMPELLED EQUALITY IN GREAT LAKES CANALS.

It has been estimated that more coastwise American shipping goes through the Canadian canals connecting our Great Lakes every week than will ever go through the Panama Canal in a month.

Many years ago Great Britain, through the Canadian officers, sought to discriminate against American ships and in favor of the Canadian coastwise ships, and to this the United States protested most vigorously, to the end that all discrimination ceased, so that American and Canadian or British coastwise ships passed through both the United States and Canadian canals connecting the Great Lakes on our north upon a condition of absolute equality. It is this method of transportation that has made the city of Chicago the great grain market of America, where our grain is loaded and carried for shipment through these canals for the markets of Europe.

SHOULD ENGLAND RETALIATE.

If we do not pass the pending measure, the purpose of which is to remove this discrimination in favor of our own coastwise shipping, will we be in a position to insist upon our vessels engaged in coastwise shipping upon the Great Lakes continuing to enjoy the freedom of the Canadian canals?

Would not Great Britain be perfectly justified in laying an embargo upon our shipping to the extent of charging our lake vessels tolls and permitting Canadian ships to go through these canals free of tolls?

Should England commence such a discrimination against our shipping on the north, she would immediately increase the value of every acre of land in Canada and proportionately decrease the value of every acre of grain-producing land in the great Mississippi Valley. The prices of corn and wheat are largely fixed in Liverpool, and from the price which these grains bring at Liverpool must be deducted the cost of transportation across the Atlantic by water and from the point of production in the Mississippi Valley to the seaboard by rail. If our vessels are charged tolls on the Great Lakes, it will mean a corresponding increase in freight rates to the seaboard, and this in turn will bring a corresponding reduction in the price of grain to the farmer.

APPEAL TO MISSISSIPPI VALLEY MEMBERS.

I want to appeal to the Representatives in this House coming from the Middle West that in the present law, by discriminating in favor of the American coastwise shipping, we are discriminating against the farmers and the landowners of the great Mississippi Valley. We are going to make them suffer from the corresponding discriminations which will be made against American shipping upon the Great Lakes, and, in addition, you are going to make them pay, in common with other American people, for the operation of this great canal to their own injury and for the benefit of the Shipping Trust.

WILL THE CANAL PAY EXPENSES?

It is estimated that according to the schedule of tolls already prescribed that it is extremely doubtful whether the traffic through the canal will be sufficient to pay the actual operating expenses of the canal; that is, if all shipping which goes through it pays the prescribed toll; but if a large portion of it—for instance, 2,400 coastwise ships—shall be permitted to run back and forth through this canal free of toll, somebody will have to pay the expense of operation. Who will pay it?

We are under contract obligations not to charge more than a reasonable and equitable toll against the ships of other nations and can not charge the expense of operation to shipping other than our own, and therefore the American people will be required to meet the annual deficit out of the Treasury of the United States for the convenience of this great shipping combination.

SHIPBUILDING INTERESTS MAKE OLD GLORY A "TRADING STAMP."

The American shipping lobby in persistent appeals to the patriotism of Congress have succeeded in placing safeguards around coastwise shipping of the United States and have procured amendments to our navigation laws to the extent that we have been at the mercy of these shipping interests and navigation has been hampered by the Shipbuilding Trust. Under our navigation laws no ship can fly the American flag that is not built in an American shipyard and owned by American citizens. Our shipbuilders have been greedy. They say that they can not compete with the cheap labor of Europe in the construction of ships, but an investigation shows that this is not true; that American shipyards can build just as good ships and build them just as cheaply, if not more so, than English shipyards. Navigation companies refuse to be held up by shipbuilding interests of this country, and the result has been that most all of our foreign shipping is done in ships owned by American citizens flying the British flag. In other words, the shipbuilding interests of this country have been permitted to use Old Glory as a "trading stamp." No congressional grants of exemptions or other benefices are due interests of this character.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there is absolutely no economic theory to sustain the opposition to this bill, but, on the other hand, every economic reason, every impulse of national honor demand that we give this legislation to the President of the United States ungrudgingly.

THE ALLEGED CLOTURE RULE.

I have been very much entertained by gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber who talk about this measure being put through the House under the gag rule. The Committee on Rules realized that the shipping interests did not intend to give up the special privilege which they have in the present law without a serious struggle. It realized that every device conceivable to the proficient parliamentarian to delay and hinder the passage of this bill would be brought into play; that filibustering would be the order of the day. So it was quite wise that the Committee on Rules did bring in a rule providing for the immediate consideration of this bill. Oh, it is complained, we are allowing but the brief time of 20 hours to discuss the merits of this measure—only 20 hours. When the Underwood tariff bill was presented to this House, covering, as it did, more than 4,000 items and a complete reversal of the fiscal policy of the Nation, by unanimous consent general debate was limited to 60 hours. Yet gentlemen who agreed that 60 hours was ample for the discussion of this great tariff measure now say that 20 hours—one-third of that time—is not sufficient for general debate upon a bill which simply repeals a portion of a single sentence in the existing law.

And another peculiar thing about this situation: When the exemption clause was put in the Panama Canal act it was proposed by an amendment. When that amendment containing the words which it is now proposed to repeal was brought up in this House debate was limited, by unanimous consent, to two hours. Thus it will be seen that those who agreed that two hours were sufficient to debate the amendment which put the exemption clause into the law now complain because the rule only allows them ten times that amount of time to discuss a short bill which repeals that exemption clause.

Oh, it is contended, no opportunity is given for an amendment. That is untrue, because the rule expressly provides for a motion to recommit, which gives the opposition ample opportunity to formulate any amendment which it may desire to include in that motion. Nobody has ever intimated that more than one amendment was desired.

AMERICAN HONOR OUTLINES OUR DUTY.

Almost four centuries ago Cortez conceived the idea of making a strait from the Atlantic to the Pacific at the Isthmus of Panama, and from that day till this what is now the Canal Zone has been the scene of pirate raids and the source of diplomatic skirmishes. With the passage of the pending measure further diplomacy concerning it will be unnecessary, and the American Shipping Trust will be denied the privilege of playing the part of a Drake or of a Morgan.

Mr. Speaker, our national honor depends upon the passage of this bill. If we are to maintain the respect and affection of the 20 other American Republics as well as the commercial nations of the world, we must deserve it. We must not permit any grasping, mercenary private interest to intervene between us and our obligation as evidence by our own contract previously made.

The shipping monopoly has this advantage now. It would keep it, if within its power, though it tarnish the good name of the American Republic in every land and increased the suspicion and hatred of the people of our sister republics toward us. This being the policy and position of the shipping monopoly, it seems to me that our duty as representatives of the American people is plain and unmistakable. This repeal bill should be enacted, and to that end I give it my hearty support.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, approved August 24, 1912, provides, among other things, that—

> No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

This is found in section 5 of the act.

There are 24,765 vessels engaged in our coastwise trade, and not to exceed 2,500 of them will use the canal.

The toll-exemption provision which has just been read is of benefit to the owners of these 2,500 American vessels. They encounter no competition from foreign ships, for only ships of American registry can engage in our coastwise trade. The profit to these shipowners, if the toll exemption stands, can not, of course, be stated with accuracy; but it is estimated at not less than $1,000,000 and not more than $2,500,000 each year. If the people of the United States gain anything by it through reduced freight rates, it will be because those engaged in coastwise trade will endeavor to hold rates of traffic down to the lowest point. It is more probable that they will try to keep them up to the highest level. It may be that they are anxious to save this provision from repeal because they love American shippers and want them to prosper, but it is more likely they want the good thing for themselves, and can use the money.

It is a subsidy; indirect, but none the less a subsidy. It is a special privilege. The shipowners want to keep it, just as all who have special privileges desire them to continue. True, it may result in the building of more ships. That is a good thing, and that is the only good thing about the proposition that the shipowners will not appreciate.

The President has distinguished himself as a foe to special privileges. So there is nothing strange in his declaration that "in his judgment that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view."

Be that as it may, the bill containing the exemption provision passed the House May 21, 1912; it passed the Senate August 9, 1912. On the 2d day of July, 1912, the Democratic platform was adopted at the Baltimore convention. That was after the bill had been passed in the House and while it was under consideration in the Senate, before any protest had been made against it as a violation of a treaty, and 1 month and 22 days before it became a law. The platform put its seal of approval upon free tolls for coastwise vessels. It may have been an unwise declaration. It surely was if special privileges should never be created, or if such exemption constituted "a mistaken economic policy." But the words were written in the platform, and so far as the economic side of the case is concerned the convention's sanction was obtained.

But another aspect of the question certainly was not considered at the Baltimore convention. For at that time no protest against tolls exemption on the ground that it was a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been made. During the debate in the House our right to exempt from tolls our coastwise vessels was considered in reference to our treaty with Great Britain, but hurriedly considered. It would be absurd to claim that the declaration in the Baltimore platform meant that the Democratic Party would favor an exemption of our coastwise vessels from toll charges no matter what our obligations might be under existing treaties, and it would be equally absurd to claim that the convention undertook to determine in any way our obligations under such treaties.

If it be admitted that because of the Baltimore declaration Democrats are foreclosed from voting to repeal the tolls exemption out of their dislike of the economic policy involved, it does not follow that the platform declaration in the slightest degree embarrasses those who believe that they should vote for the repeal of a provision of law violating our treaty obligations.

Suppose Congress had passed two separate laws, based upon one principle and for the purpose of raising revenue, and after their passage a political party in convention assembled had made a declaration favoring such laws, and that thereafter, the constitutionality of one of them having been challenged, the Supreme Court had found it unconstitutional for reasons that clearly rendered the other law unconstitutional also, would it be charged that those voting to repeal that other law, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court, violated a pledge of a party platform?

After the Baltimore convention Great Britain filed its first protest against the tolls-exemption provision. There has been an exchange of notes, and although there are differences of opinion we are advised by the President:

> I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

Democrats are not obliged to violate the obligations of a treaty in order not to violate the declarations of a party platform.

It was apparent in 1835 that England was interested in the project of an isthmial canal. In that year President Jackson sent Col. Biddle to Central America and to New Granada to investigate canal routes and learn just what laws or treaties had been made in those countries affecting the construction of a canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific. England very promptly addressed a note to the Government at Washington inquiring the purpose of the Biddle mission.

Until the construction of the Suez Canal, England had as great, if not a greater, interest in an isthmian canal than the United States, because by it the route of travel between her own ports and her Asiatic and Australian possessions would be materially shortened; but with the accession of territory as a result of the Mexican War and the discovery of gold in California the United States realized to a greater extent than heretofore the importance of a waterway connecting the two great oceans.

It was thought this connection could best be obtained by the so-called Nicaragua route; but if the canal were established there, the Atlantic end of it would pass through territory belonging to or claimed by Great Britain. Apart, therefore, from the interest Great Britain had in the contemplated work, it was necessary to obtain her consent to its undertaking on account of her proprietorship of the Mosquito Coast, as well as the consent of Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

In 1850 a convention as to a ship canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans was made by the United States and Great Britain. It was arranged by John M. Clayton, then Secretary of State, and Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, the English minister, and it was called, after them, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Some of the provisions of that treaty are extremely important, for they show what kind of a canal it was then proposed to construct and the attitude of the United States and Great Britain toward it.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal. (Art. 1.)

It should be borne in mind that neither nation, nor both nations, intended to do the work as a Government project. It was expected a company would be formed, raise sufficient capital, and build the canal.

The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. (Art. 5.)

And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same. (Art. 6.)

Let special attention be given to these statements. What was the great design of the treaty? Here the answer was given: To construct and maintain a canal between the two oceans on equal terms to all mankind.

The Government of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications—should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway—which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways, as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford. (Art. 8.)

Here it is asserted that the United States and Great Britain not only desired to accomplish a particular object but also desired to establish a general principle.

What is that general principle sought to be established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? Does it not conform to the great design of the treaty? And as that was to construct and maintain a canal on equal terms to all mankind, can it be said that the general principle refers simply to its protection? Is it not rather that the great work shall be accomplished for the benefit of all the world, and without discrimination all the world may use it on equal terms? Is it claimed that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, where the great design and general principle are stated, and to which reference is made in later treaties, the United States could assert the right to pass its merchant ships through the canal on better terms than the merchant ships of England?

While the Nicaragua route was at that time considered the most feasible one, the agreement was not limited to that route, but to any interoceanic communication by canal or railway—at Panama or elsewhere on the Isthmus.

By the terms of this convention the United States was tied up; it could not build a canal itself; but it was not a one-sided arrangement—England, too, was tied up; it could not build a canal itself; and the conditions created by the treaty continued until the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, proclaimed February 22, 1902.

A conclusion had been reached that the undertaking was too great for any company or any corporation. A great nation like England might build the canal; a great nation like the United States might do it. But before either could do it, it was necessary to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The Suez Canal had been constructed, and an isthmian canal was not of so great importance to England as it had been, but it was of far greater importance to the United States because of the development of the Pacific coast and our possessions in the Pacific Ocean. The United States was willing to undertake the work, and Great Britain was willing to annul those provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that stood in the way; but it was specifically stated that the general principle of neutralization, which, of course, includes equality, established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, should not be impaired. What was that general principle? "Equal rights to all nations in the use of the canal."

Of course, we built the canal. It cost $400,000,000, and we acquired from Panama a perpetual easement to the strip of land through which the canal passes, but we did these necessary things for the purpose of building the canal under the terms of our agreement; we did none of them for the purpose of escaping from that agreement. It is said that we purchased land from the Republic of Panama, that it is our land, and that we constructed the canal in our own territory, and hence it is of no concern to other nations how we may choose to operate and maintain it; and this is urged in the very face of article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

In article 3 of this treaty, which was not intended to impair the general principle established under the Clayton-Bulwer convention, occurs a sentence around which the greater part of the discussion concerning our rights under the treaty revolves:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

"The vessels of commerce and of war of all nations." Is the United States included in the words "all nations," or should it read "all nations except the United States"? It seems to me that whatever doubt may arise as to the inclusion or exclusion of the United States when the sentence standing alone is considered, there can be little question but that, in view of the history of the canal, of the prior negotiations concerning it, and the general declarations in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, it was the intention of those who made the treaty to include in the words "all nations" the United States.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded, Hon. Joseph H. Choate was our ambassador to Great Britain, and he had opportunities perhaps greater than anyone now living of knowing the intentions of the men who prepared the draft of the treaty. He says:

Lord Pauncefote and Secretary Hay were two of the noblest, truest, and purest statesmen on earth. It never crossed the minds of either of them or of myself that the treaty ever meant anything else than exactly what it says. But Mr. Taft succeeded in reading something else in, and Congress also did, and Congress passed the law and he signed the bill. It has created a situation that has raised the distrust of foreign nations of our willingness to stand by the treaties we make. There are two ways out of it, one of which I hope will be adopted; that is, to repeal the eighth clause of the Panama Canal act. We will dispose of the matter that way and leave it where it was. Another way is to arbitrate the question as quickly and effectively as possible. You can not expect nations to enter into any arrangement or negotiations with us for the judicial settlement of international disputes unless they are satisfied, as they were always satisfied until a year or two ago, that the United States is ready to stand by its word.

Mr. Choate says "eighth clause of the Panama Canal act." He means, of course, the tolls-exemption clause in section 5 of that act.

Senator Davis, of Minnesota, who was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate when the treaty was ratified, in recommending its ratification, said:

That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practical, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality for all.

That the United States would not if they could obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belongs to all mankind.

That, while they aim at no exclusive privilege for themselves, they could never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any other great commercial power.

I have reached the conclusion that the provision exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and because the honor of the United States is a more precious thing than any land or other possession whose value can be measured in money, I believe in preserving it without stain or the suspicion of a stain, and therefore I favor the repeal of this provision.

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. SHARP addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, on March 5, 1914, the President of the United States addressed the Senate and the House of Representatives in these words:

Gentlemen of the Congress, I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

The bill under consideration has for its purpose the imposition of uniform charges or tolls upon all vessels of commerce using the Panama Canal, including those engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. The issues involved have been obscured, beclouded, and misunderstood by confusing the rights, duties, and obligations of the United States as a sovereign power with those which it assumed when it directly undertook the task of constructing, maintaining, and operating the Panama Canal. If we had exercised the option conferred upon us by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and had authorized the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Panama Canal by a corporation or association of individuals, organized for private profit, the questions involved in this bill would never have arisen.

The treaty obligations which we have assumed enjoins upon us the duty of keeping the canal "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations upon terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise," and that "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

From the foregoing quotation from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it appears that if we had authorized the construction of the canal by a corporation or association of private individuals, we were required to enjoin upon such corporation or association the same duties and obligations toward all nations, their citizens and subjects, as the laws of the United States and of each of the several States of this Union enjoin upon the railroad corporations toward the public, namely, "just and equitable charges," "terms of entire equality," "no discrimination," and no rebates out of the common fund collected from the traffic to part of the shippers, so that charges to the remainder may not exceed what is just and reasonable.

But in addition to the conditions and limitations which I have quoted from the treaty, the duty was also devolved upon the United States of prescribing and enforcing other rules and regulations for the neutralization of the canal, such as the rights of a belligerent in time of war in the canal, forbidding its blockade, or other acts of hostility within it, authorizing the United States to protect it, and so forth. These latter obligations assumed by the United States were enjoined upon and accepted by it as a sovereign power and could not be delegated, and it was no doubt the necessity arising from the assumption of these duties as a sovereign power which led the Government of the United States to conclude that, as it had assumed toward the nations and the citizens of the world the duty of providing them with a canal across the Isthmus "on terms of entire equality," upon "conditions and charges of traffic" that "shall be just and equitable," and because the people and Government of the United States had experienced much difficulty in enforcing these same regulations against the railroads in behalf of the people of the United States, under its power to regulate commerce, it was constrained to undertake the whole enterprise and not delegate any portion of the work. Unless this distinction is kept clearly in mind, viz, the duties and obligations of the United States as a sovereign power to other nations, and its duty as owner, operator, and manager of the canal toward the citizens and subjects of all nations, including our own, we can not hope to reach an intelligent conclusion as to our rights and obligations under the treaty and to our own citizens under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

That this treaty and those preceding it, together with the official declarations of those authorized to speak for the United States in the past 100 years, have indelibly impressed upon the Panama Canal the character of a public highway, to the use of which the commerce of all men and all nations is entitled upon equal terms, subject only to the payment of a reasonable and uniform tax or toll to defray the expense and cost of its construction, maintenance, and operation, is as clear to me as the English language can make it; but honest men differ as to the extent and character of the trust impressed upon this great highway in our hands, and we may therefore resort to our own legislative construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as an aid in arriving at its true purpose and meaning.

When this treaty was pending in the United States Senate a motion was made by Senator Bard, of California, to strike out article 3, a part of which I have quoted, and substitute the following:

> The United States reserves the right, in the regulation and management of the canal, to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in coastwise trade.

Upon a call of the roll, this amendment was rejected—yeas 27, nays 43—thereby recording the solemn judgment of a majority of the Senators that the power to discriminate in favor of American coastwise vessels ought not to be conferred upon the United States, together with the admission of those voting in favor of the amendment that without it the power to grant free tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States did not then and does not now exist without violating the express terms of the treaty. It is said that because the people of the United States built the canal they have the right to discriminate in favor of some vessels owned by their own people in its use. The same argument used to be advanced in behalf of the power of the railroads to discriminate. Some contended that where railroads were built with private capital those who owned and managed them had a right to grant lower rates to large shippers or to grant them rebates, but this contention wholly ignored the fact that the railroads are public highways—that those in control of them are public agents charged with the duty of affording this public service to all persons on the same conditions as this canal has been dedicated to all persons, to wit, on terms of "entire equality," and to charge no more than is "just and equitable."

Rebating by the managers of railroads is now made a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, and these criminal statutes would have been promptly extended to those in charge of the Panama Canal if we had authorized its construction and operation by a private company. Just how we can honorably escape from the obligations to the citizens and subjects of every nation who use this canal by building it and collecting the tolls ourselves no one has yet explained.

The Government of the United States by its own declarations and under treaties signed by it is charged as trustee with the obligation to administer this great highway of commerce upon terms of absolute equality, and to place no greater burden upon that commerce passing through the canal than "shall be just and equitable." This prohibits all rebates and discriminations.

In November, 1881, in written instructions to James Russell Lowell, our minister to England, James G. Blaine, known in history as the most militant and aggressive of our Secretaries of State in asserting and defending every right of the Government and people of the United States in negotiations with foreign countries, said on this subject:

> Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe. And equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations. In time of war, aside from the defensive use to be made of it by the country in which it is constructed and by the United States, the canal shall be impartially closed against the war vessels of all belligerents.

Much of the discussion in opposition to this bill is mere "froth" and demagogism. Reference has frequently been made to the declaration in the Baltimore platform in favor of free tolls. Just how that plank got into that platform no one seems to know. Members of the committee on resolutions declare that they did not learn of it until after the convention had adjourned and they had returned to their homes. The general opinion entertained by Democrats was that the declaration in the platform against all forms of subsidies and bounties nullified the free-tolls plank. I repudiated the plank as soon as I learned of it, shortly after the adjournment of the convention, as a patent and palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, which makes treaties the supreme law of the land, and I have ever since renounced and denounced it in every reference to the subject.

The talk indulged in by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] about "lining the nest of the American eagle with hair from the mane and tail of the British lion" and the indorsement by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] of the sentiment, "My country, right or wrong," may tickle the ears of the groundlings, but ought to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest American citizen who is jealous of his country's reputation for honor involved in complying with its treaty obligations.

These frothy declamations of spurious patriotism, inspired by a shout in favor of "the old flag and an appropriation," are always aroused in the mouths of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] whenever they scent some special privilege like the subsidy involved in this exemption from tolls of the vessels of this coastwise shipping monopoly.

It is conceded on both sides of this controversy that the collection of uniform tolls from all vessels using the canal, exempting none, will not raise sufficient revenue to pay the operating expenses of the canal, and that an annual appropriation will have to be made out of the United States Treasury to make up the deficiency. The logical and practical effect, then, of exempting coastwise vessels from payment for the use of the canal will be the exact equivalent of donating out of the United States Treasury to each vessel of this coastwise monopoly which uses the canal between $10,000 and $20,000 for each trip, depending upon the size of the vessel, and aggregating about $2,000,000 per annum.

In relations between nations involving a question of honor each is a law unto itself. If we had intrusted to a corporation or association of individuals the work of constructing, maintaining, and operating this canal, one of the victims of this discrimination could hale the defendant into a United States court and compel him to comply with the stipulations of this treaty, but no court has jurisdiction to hear and determine this question except the Congress of the United States, where the matter is now on trial.

A vote in favor of this bill will vindicate the honor of the United States Government; in my judgment, nothing else will.

[Mr. LEVER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. VOLLMER. Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the repeal of the exemption of coastwise shipping from Panama Canal tolls for the reason, among others, that under our navigation laws the coastwise shipping is a monopoly made so by the law which restricts it to American ships. This shipping is largely owned by railroad corporations and by interlocking trusts which do not compete with each other, but keep out of each other's ports. This shipping combination requires no subsidy, and any subsidy given to it in the way of exemption from canal tolls will not add one ship to our merchant marine engaged in the foreign trade, the extension of which we all so earnestly desire. This exemption will amount to about $1,000,000 annually in tolls. I have visited the canal and made some study of it from both an engineering and financial standpoint and I am satisfied that it is a physical impossibility to pass enough ships through it to get enough revenue out of it to pay for the upkeep and defense of the canal and 2 per cent on our investment of $400,000,000, all of which will require about $25,000,000 a year. This will mean, then, that if we exempt our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls that a sum of not less than a million dollars a year must be raised by taxing the American people in order to turn over a gratuity of like amount to a great, wealthy shipping combination, which already has an absolute monopoly conferred upon it by law.

I do not believe that the exemption of coastwise shipping from canal tolls would have the effect of giving us lower transcontinental railroad rates in the Middle West, because I believe that the railroads and trusts affected would simply pocket this $1,000,000 and render little or nothing in return for same. The difference per ton of freight which it would make for our shippers in the Middle West if this shipping trust should give us the whole benefit of this exemption by a reduction in their carrying charges as large as the amount of the exemption, and the consequent reduction of transcontinental railroad rates to correspond, would be infinitesimal in amount, in my judgment; but if we fail to heed the request of President Wilson to repeal this act, a far graver danger confronts the shippers of the Middle West in the immediate future.

Canada has in the neighborhood of our northern boundary some very important canals built and in process of construction which are to profoundly influence transcontinental railroad rates in the near future. If we discriminate against their shipping by exempting our coastwise shipping from canal tolls, Canada will certainly get even and more than even by discriminating against us on these canals.

The fact that an unconsidered or ill-considered plank on the subject was placed in the Baltimore platform is not controlling, in my judgment.

I was a delegate to the Baltimore convention and well remember the condition of absolute physical and mental collapse in which the delegates to that convention found themselves at the end of that week of torrid weather and titanic struggle in Baltimore after the nominations had been made and when the platform was reported and rushed through. The people at the national election of 1912 can not be said to have spoken on this plank, because it did not enter into the subjects actually considered during that campaign. It was merely a blunder and should be rectified as soon as possible. The fact that the majority of the Democrats in Congress voted against the exemption when the matter was pending in Congress before indicates that it is not good Democratic doctrine; and, besides that, it is plainly contradictory to the plank in the Baltimore platform which declares against subsidies of any kind; and opposition to subsidies and special privileges of any kind or character has been good Democratic doctrine ever since Jefferson.

The peculiar fact about it is that the declaration against all subsidies and that for toll exemption are found in one and the same plank in the Baltimore platform, like two children in one cradle. One of these children Democrats will recognize immediately as their own, because in every feature it shows that it is the legitimate offspring of good, honest Democratic thought, the lawful wedlock of "equal rights to all" and "special privileges to none." The other child was not born in holy Democratic matrimony. It is not of the same race or breed or color of skin as the first. It was conceived in the lust of political office, when that lady of easy virtue, economic fallacy, was impregnated with the golden seed of American coastwise monopoly. Now, you Democrats, which will you choose to father? You can not take both. Will you take to your bosom the bastard brat which some malicious or misguided hands placed on your doorstep at Baltimore?

In my recent campaign for Congress, when a lying attack was made upon me that I was not at heart a Wilson man, I made a solemn public promise that I would stand by the President. How can I refuse under these circumstances to heed the first appeal which comes from him to me, and when such appeal is based upon the consideration that the Nation's honor is involved and that he needs this action of Congress for which he asks in order to enable him to carry out his splendid foreign policy? People who do not understand what has actually been done and is being done by the President sneer at this policy, and I have heard men on the floor of Congress attack the courage of the President and Secretary of State. I have often differed from Mr. Bryan on questions of policy, but I do not think that any man honestly believes that either he or Woodrow Wilson is lacking in moral courage. It requires the very highest type of moral courage to resist the yellow press, which is always willing to involve the country in the horrors of war in order to sell more papers, and the frenzied appeals of the wild-eyed jingoes in and out of Congress, who give us so many and such cheap exhibitions of patriotism.

If we become involved in war in Mexico, I am in favor of sending to the front and having shot, before any other husband, brother, father, or son shall go to the front, first, the jingo editors of the yellow press; second, the jingo Congressmen and Senators and the peanut politicans who would use their country's difficulties in order to gain partisan advantage; third, the contractors, those foul birds of prey who are hovering about to gain great pecuniary profit from war contracts.

The plain language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty pledges this Nation's honor to perfect equality of treatment for the shipping of all nations using the Panama Canal, including our own. Our heedless, willful course in international relations with the leading powers of the world in recent years has been such as to get us the name and reputation of a "rowdy Nation."

How can the President and Secretary of State carry out their mission of peace and the extremely important and delicate negotiations in which they are involved in seeking to accomplish that grand humanitarian end if our Congress will now refuse to heed the appeal of our great, splendid President and again puts the seal of its approval upon a policy which I must regard as one of national perfidy and dishonor?

I recognize the fact that on all ordinary occasions I should follow our leaders on this floor, and it is a matter of great regret to me that I should be obliged so soon after coming here to refuse to follow them. But I recognize that I am here and now confronted with a higher obligation. My duty as an American citizen and a Democrat, both, compels me to take my stand with the President of my country when he calls upon me for such aid as I can render in this hour of my country's need. To those on this floor who have been insinuating that patronage considerations are influencing Members to vote with the President on this occasion I want to indignantly repel this charge if it be made with reference to myself.

If there be any one duty of my present position more distasteful to me than any other, it is the distribution of the patronage and the disputes growing out of it have been the only shadow on my enjoyment of my present duties. The President might influence me by taking all patronage away from me, not by giving me any more of these doubtful gifts which every Congressman recognizes as a source of weakness and not of strength.

The country has been nauseated for some days by the continuous vaudeville which we have had on this floor known as "twisting the British lion's tail." In my State, where for the past quarter of a century I have been identified with every great cause near and dear to the hearts of my fellow citizens of Irish or German birth or descent, nobody will dare to accuse me of being a subservient tool of British diplomacy. I am proud, above all things, of my virile Americanism, but I want Americanism to stand for the sacred observance of letter and spirit of the solemn treaty obligations voluntarily assumed by the American Government. And I want that scrupulous regard for contract rights to be manifested toward the humblest and meanest nation with whom we deal. In the pending case an appeal is made to our greed and our vanity and to old animosities in order to get us to violate what the whole civilized world agrees is our contract. To love the Old Flag truly is to seek to keep it flying high in the pure air of righteousness, the beautiful symbol of our Nation's ideals, and not to drag it through the filth and mire of selfishness and racial prejudice and narrow provincialism and jingo bumptiousness.

[Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that I very much regret not to find it consistent with my convictions that I be in accord with the President in the stand he has taken upon this international question, for I appreciate that it is a great advantage to our country that all parties stand united with the party in power and sustain it in its position taken on issues arising with foreign nations. If minority parties can find it consistent with their principles and convictions to give the party in power their support on such issues the position of the home country is thereby greatly strengthened, and it may thus, to a much greater advantage, command the respect of foreign powers. But a limit should be observed upon the laudable predilection that the party in power is always right upon its stand taken in disputes arising with other nations; and, in my judgment, the present instance affords a striking example of a case and of the place where the limit should be fixed.

Mr. Speaker, I would not criticize a disposition to take sides with a foreign country even against our own when the foreign country may be right, but no nation can command the respect of other nations, much less preserve its own self-respect, when it stands ready to yield the demand of a foreign power, regardless of whether it is "right or wrong." But, sir, it certainly behooves members of our minority parties to pause before adopting the course of the administration when it expressly takes sides against our own country, even if it be right.

Mr. Speaker, the American people do not expect the question to be decided in their favor whether it is "right or wrong," but they will insist that the question be decided in their favor if that be right. On the other hand, the American people will not tolerate the question being decided in favor of England if that be wrong, but would cheerfully acquiesce in a decision made in favor of England after ascertainment that it would be right. The American people expect the question to be settled upon its merits. No nation can respectably contend for more or expect less.

Mr. Speaker, how would I have the question determined? I would say, determine it in any manner becoming the respectability and dignity of first-plass powers. First, by diplomacy, or by mutual agreement; but if this failed, then by arbitration; but if this failed, then by an arrangement mutually agreed upon between the two nations. Each prompted by the disposition to be fair, I feel very confident the two peoples can themselves ascertain the right and gracefully adopt it. But there exists beyond these alternatives other very respectable modes of reaching a solution.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress is asked to repeal the clause exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for the alleged reason that it constitutes a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, yet it has not been arbitrated or adjudicated that the act sought to be repealed does violate the treaty; neither has the counselor of the State Department, nor the Attorney General, the highest legal advisor of the Government, sanctioned this position, at any rate, not so far as the Congress knows. True the President expresses it as his opinion that the British construction is right. But to do the President justice, his message, taken as a whole, makes exigency or expediency paramount to the question of the proper construction of the treaty. I am perfectly fair in construing the message to mean that in any event, regardless of what the proper construction may be, we should not stop to parley about this, but that we should courteously, cheerfully, and gracefully acquiesce in the over-sea construction.

Mr. Speaker, granting that we must pay great deference to the advice of the President, we must not forget the opinion of other distinguished statesmen to the contrary. His two predecessor Presidents were and are convinced of the right of the American side. Roosevelt was President when the treaty was made, and only a little over a year ago expressed himself in regard to our rights thereunder in this language:

[Extract from letter of Theodore Roosevelt in Outlook, Jan. 18, 1913.]

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

President Taft on the date of the approval of the act including the tolls-exemption provision, now sought to be repealed, in a paper written expressing his views of the different provisions of that act gave special approval, not only of the policy of exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, but at the same time of our rights, notwithstanding the treaty, to do so. I shall take time to read only one brief paragraph of the several which are very pertinent to the question. I read:

The British protest, therefore, is a proposal to read into the treaty a surrender by the United States of its right to regulate its own commerce in its own way and by its own methods, a right which neither Great Britain herself, nor any other nation that may use the canal, has surrendered or proposes to surrender. The surrender of this right is not claimed to be in terms. It is only to be inferred from the fact that the United States has conditionally granted to all the nations the use of the canal without discrimination by the United States between the grantees, but as the treaty leaves all nations desiring to use the canal with full right to deal with their own vessels as they see fit, the United States would only be discriminating against itself if it were to recognize the soundness of the British contention.

The very distinguished Democrat, Hon. Richard Olney, who was Secretary of State under the Cleveland administration, has expressed himself very explicitly and certainly very ably in favor of the American side of the question. But I quote very briefly from his opinion, as follows:

4. The one provision possible to be relied upon for that purpose is rule 1 of article 3, declaring that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality * * *"—and the single point is, are the words "all nations" inclusive or exclusive of the United States?

It seems difficult to successfully contend that the United States is included.

(a) The treaty is a contract by which the proprietor of a canal fixes the terms upon which it grants the use of the canal to its customers.

(b) It was needed for that purpose only; it was not needed to fix the terms upon which the United States and its nationals—its cestui que trust—should use the canal, because its use without tolls or otherwise, as the United States might choose, is a necessary incident of its ownership of the canal.

It can not reasonably be argued that in fixing the terms for the use of its canal by customers the United States looked upon itself as one of the customers.

Mr. Speaker, I take earnest issue with the administration upon its adoption of the English construction of the treaty. Not only this, I differ with the administration just as widely, and, if possible, even more widely, as to the manner in which the contention, not the least bit acute in my estimate, but this may be because I am not duly informed, should be determined. It is plain by the language used in the message that the purpose of the pending repeal bill is not to secure a determination of the construction of the treaty upon its merits, but to escape the necessity of a construction. The position of the administration is that the English construction should be granted because "we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting," to insist upon an ascertainment of the right construction; we are asked for the sake of "our reputation for generosity" to grant the foreign construction "without quibble or hesitation." But, Mr. Speaker, how long will we remain "too big, too powerful, and too self-respecting" if we shall follow a policy to meekly surrender at the behest of foreign powers our right to exercise freely sovereignty possessed by our Government?

Mr. Speaker, viewed by the analogy of disputes arising between individuals and resort had to courts for settlement, the present course of the administration is equivalent to a defendant rushing into court and confessing the case of the plaintiff before the latter has commenced his action. Why not await a formal and dignified making up of the issue or issues which the difference involves. Why not await the joining of issue in a formal way, the production of the evidence, the making of the arguments, and the submission of the case to a properly constituted tribunal for its determination? Why not make up the case and let it be disposed of in a formal and dignified way, provided that after faithful effort made by the contending parties to reach a satisfactory understanding or agreement their efforts shall have failed? Why make haste to retract our legislative assertion of our sovereign right to regulate our coastwise trade, only because such right has been brought in question by another power or powers? It must be made a forthwith matter, not permitting of time to look into the merits of the question. We must surrender in great haste, "right or wrong."

Mr. Speaker, I regard it as the first and highest solemn duty of the membership of this House to jealously guard and safeguard the fundamental principles of our institutions in their full strength and integrity, and not to permit any conceived exigency for meeting a threatened peril, however imminent, to outweigh their Nation's honor. Mr. Speaker, there are times when the most dangerous thing to do is to run, and it has always been regarded as a disgrace to get shot in the back.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the statesmen and distinguished men who have espoused the English construction use too much profundity in their reasoning; too much circumlocution, if not circumbendibus, in their arguments, thus:

Wrapping nonsense round,
With pomp and darkness till it seems profound.

They employ too many fallacies. Where language and logic fail they invoke altruism and appeal to our magnanimity. They had just as well be candid and concede that they are standing for a clear-cut give-away of American rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is my candid judgment that if a controversy between two individuals over the question of whether one owed the other $20 hinged upon the construction to be given the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the case were submitted to a justice of the peace, of average country crossroads ability, for determination, that the large amount of common sense usually enjoyed and exercised by these officials, with their limited knowledge of law in most instances, a correct decision would be reached without much hesitation. In keeping with the fact that the canal is a short cut from one coast to the other, a justice of the peace would hold his judgment down to grass and reach the point directly without ascending into the high altitudes of altruism, which has nothing to do with contracts, and view the case from its material physical standpoint, including the construction of the canal by the United States at its own expense, across its own territory; and that in the light of these and other circumstances, a justice of the peace would read a "title clear" of the United States to its own.

Mr. Speaker, it is pertinent to here inquire, What business or dollar diplomacy policy interest is involved in the dispute between England and America. Substantially, it is that England claims equal rights with the United States so far as benefits are concerned in the use of the canal with respect to tolls charges. England still wants to maintain the equal right with the United States it would have enjoyed under the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty had the canal been built pursuant thereto. But not only has the Clayton-Bulwer treaty been annulled by our new treaty, but the circumstances have changed. Under the old treaty the two nations stood equally with respect to any canal that should be built to connect the two oceans. It was expected that the canal would not be built by either country itself, but would be built by an American corporation under the joint auspices of the two countries, and that they would enjoy its use upon an equal footing, and at the same time would afford the canal and the investment therein adequate protection; but no canal was ever constructed pursuant to this treaty. Finally, the conclusion was reached by the United States that our Government itself should construct a canal, but this rendered it expedient that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty be abrogated. Accordingly, negotiations were entered into for the making of the treaty dated November 18, 1901, known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. Speaker, another very important change, of a fundamental character, occurred in our favor. The United States became the unqualified owner of the present Panama Canal Zone, possessed of full sovereignty over the canal, equally as if it had been constructed across some of the States of our Union. And this change took place after the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Consequently, the new treaty in no manner qualifies our sovereignty over the Canal Zone, with the United States as absolute owner, which was not in contemplation when the treaty was made. I so maintain independently of the question of the proper construction of the treaty, as applicable to territory not our own.

Mr. Speaker, while the dispute between th two countries involves the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, what is the essence of the difference? As I understand it, it is financial with England, and financial only. England apprehends that the nonpayment of tolls by our coastwise vessels will have to be made up by foreign countries, patrons of the canal, but this is not only an unwarranted assumption, but does injustice to existing facts. By the rate of tolls already fixed foreign nations are required to pay the same as if our coastwise vessels paid tolls. Therefore the small fraction that remains of the English contention is that, while we have a right to grant a subsidy direct, the treaty does not permit us to do so indirectly, as by exempting from tolls. So, reduced to a final analysis, it is with England more a matter of form than of substance. While England complains for financial reasons, the difference in this respect, if any, in a practical way, is next to immaterial with the United States as compared with the great principle involved of whether we have a right to control our own affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I shall print here in my remarks, without unnecessarily consuming the time of the House to read them, the essential parts of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and this followed by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, referred to in the new treaty; and this followed by the message of the President pursuant to which the pending bill was framed and introduced.

ESSENTIAL PART OF HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 8 OF CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY OF 1850.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

Gentlemen of the Congress: I have come to you upon an errand which can be very briefly performed, but I beg that you will not measure its importance by the number of sentences in which I state it. No communication I have addressed to the Congress carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country, and I come now to speak upon a matter with regard to which I am charged in a peculiar degree, by the Constitution itself, with personal responsibility.

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from the position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

Mr. Speaker, what was the object of the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901? The purpose was to clear the deck to the United States to itself construct a canal without being hampered by any other country; specifically to clear the deck of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty formed in 1850, which bound the two countries to cooperate and be coequal with reference to the construction and enjoyment of any canal connecting the two oceans. The making of the new treaty, called the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was equivalent to the giving of a quitclaim deed by England to the United States relinquishing its treaty rights to participate with the United States in any manner in the construction or control of a canal which the United States might construct, however, saving to England that the general clause of neutralization contained in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to be preserved. But, Mr. Speaker, I contend this pretended reservation, or preservation, of the qualified portion of article 8, consists more of form than of substance or value. It preserved to England nothing which it would not have received, or been accorded, by the United States without such reservation having been made. Without any canal treaties made with other foreign countries the United States will accord to them the "general neutralization" which England claims under article 8.

Mr. Speaker, I beg to urge that by the adoption of paragraph 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the purpose of England was to guard against a possible construction that it was yielding any rights which should and would have been accorded it had the Clayton-Bulwer treaty never been made. I urge the purpose was to guard against a construction that this new treaty was to constitute a restriction upon its rights it had upon the seas before it entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I urge that paragraph 1 was intended to preserve England's equal right, no less and no greater, to the canal with the other nations who did not participate in either treaty. The very fact that England is to secure no more than these other nations not parties to the treaty is conclusive to me that England's purpose was to make sure that it did not stipulate to take less than other nations not parties to the treaty. It is a very conspicuous circumstance that England and the United States finally concluded it to be unnecessary for other nations than themselves to become parties to the new treaty. The reason of this was because the other nations had not been parties to the old treaty.

It is very plain that there could have been conceived no necessity or propriety for the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had not the Clayton-Bulwer treaty been made. Therefore, I maintain the purpose and effect of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to restore each country to its position which had existed before the making of any treaty upon the subject.

Mr. Speaker, without going thoroughly into details and thrashing over straw already thrashed out, the solution of the question depends upon whether England is entitled to every single right under the canal as if it were its owner equally with the United States. In other words, has the United States no right as owner which England and other foreign nations are not entitled to enjoy on precisely the same terms as the United States? In other words, if the United States charges over-sea vessels, including even its own vessels, which is the case, tolls for passing through the canal, does the treaty require it to charge its own coastwise vessels tolls? Is the United States forbidden by the terms of the treaty to discriminate, if you can call it a discrimination, in favor of its own coastwise steamship lines? In solving this question the fact must not be lost sight of that the coastwise trade of the United States is a domestic affair of its own, the same as our navigable rivers and Great Lakes navigation is domestic. That the validity of the statutes of the United States securing to our coastwise steamship lines a monopoly of the carrying trade, in exclusion of foreign countries, is not questioned by foreign countries, is conclusive that the coastwise trade is legitimately a domestic affair of our own.

Mr. Speaker, I submit the most England or any other foreign country can claim in the way of the use of the canal is the usual right accorded to a common carrier, for the operation of the canal more nearly approximates that of a common carrier than any other public utility. I claim that all the rights England is guaranteed by the treaty are such as are most generally accorded by a common carrier to its patrons. We all know that a railway common carrier may transport its own property and carry as passengers its own employees and the property of its employees without charge, and at the same time charge reasonable rates to all third-person patrons. But let me instance an example that will bring the question right home. It is a concrete case rather than an imaginary or hypothetical one: The United States owns a line of steamships plying between New York and the Panama Canal. Operating this line on our Atlantic coast, it follows the Government might find reason to establish a Pacific coast line—one or more. In fact, the United States might eventually find reason for monopolizing all coastwise navigation to itself. Presumably, the Government may convey all the vessels it now owns, and additional vessels it may acquire in the future, through the canal. In such case, would England insist that Uncle Sam should go through the form to take the usual tolls price out of his right-hand pocket and put it into his left-hand pocket in order to avoid a violation of the treaty, and in order that Uncle Sam should sedulously treat himself just as much of a stranger to himself, in the use of his own property, as he should a foreign power? Is Uncle Sam required to thus protect himself against himself? Is there any reason in such a contention? Is it not absurd that the treaty must be construed to mean that our Government can not discriminate in favor of itself by permitting its own vessels to escape the payment of tolls; absurd that the United States itself was one of "all nations" to which the United States should accord equal terms in the use of the canal? Does it mean the United States itself is one of the nations to whom the tolls imposed should be "fair and equitable"? Mr. Speaker, here is the crux of the controversy. It is whether the United States was a third-person party to itself. Do we have the anomaly of the United States being the party of the first part and at the same time being the party or the second part, or one of the parties of the second part, together with England, and yet, at the same time, a third-person party, together with other nations not participating in the treaty? This involves the proposition whether the United States bound itself to itself, for itself, against itself, to not discriminate in its own favor.

Why, the very same economic principle as the payment of tolls by the Government to itself for its own vessels is involved in the law exempting Government bonds from taxation, likewise the same principle is involved in the exemption of State property, for instance, State capitol buildings, from taxation.

Mr. Speaker, I regard it to be the consensus of opinion of the most distinguished statesmen and men who have spoken and written upon the subject that exemption from tolls constitutes an indirect subsidy or is the equivalent of a subsidy. It is safe to say no statesman gainsays the right of any nation to grant subsidies to any or all of its ship lines. Most, if not all, of the leading foreign countries very freely exercise this right. Our own country, while recognizing its right to grant ship subsidies, has not adopted or followed the policy except in a very limited way. We do in one way and another favor our own ships and ship lines in effect amounting to a subsidy, the benefit being the same as if a direct subsidy were granted. Different instances could be cited, but I deem it peculiarly pertinent to mention that the Democratic tariff revision bill, passed last fall, gives our American vessels an advantage on importations they carry from foreign countries which can not be considered to be anything else but an expense and direct subsidy, though it be small. While passing, this estops the supporters of the repeal bill from justifying it upon the economic ground that subsidies are wrong or that they themselves are against subsidies.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that some English diplomat has contended, and I think it was Mr. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires, that while the United States might grant subsidies direct to its coastwise ships, it would not under the treaty in question be permitted to indirectly grant a subsidy by exempting ships from the payment of tolls. I hope the distinguished Englishman, whoever it was that I have in mind, may stand corrected that the reverse contention would have been correct, that we could not do indirectly what we had no right to do directly.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that the construction of the canal was attended with great hazard, including not only great cost of life, as measured by the fatalities under the French undertaking, but as well the possibility of the loss of the hundreds of millions it cost by the wrecking or ruin of the canal tiself by an earthquake. Doubtless at first the conception to cut a canal from ocean to ocean at some narrow point was regarded by most people as impracticable, and as nearly like a dream as was the inspiration of Jules Verne when he wrote his Thirty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea. No such a gigantic waterway improvement had theretofore ever been accomplished. But our torpedo boats do now successfully travel beneath the sea, and the canal, a mammoth achievement, stands an accomplished fact. But I mention this feature to show the improbability, when the United States was hazarding so much of its blood and its treasure, with England relieved by the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty from every kind of expensive responsibility, that it was then contemplated by either side that the United States was yielding to England its sovereign power over its domestic or coastwise vessels. Why should the United States be made to pay such a penalty for making so unexcelled a bestowment upon the commerce of the world?

Mark you, the position of the administration is that the United States is to lose in any event. The contention of England is to be granted if England is right. The contention of England is to be granted if England is wrong. Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of the parley between the white man and the Indian who were going together to hunt wild turkey, with the possibility that they would mistakingly bring down a buzzard. The white man, intending to be plausible, if not fair, proposed to the Indian, "I will take the turkey and you may take the buzzard, or you may take the buzzard and I will take the turkey." "No," says the Indian, "white man, buzzard Indian all the time." So, in this case, the United States is to be "buzzarded" all the time. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if the construction of Britain is to be conceded, the question arises, What benefit does the United States derive by the expenditure of nearly $400,000,000 expended for the construction of the Panama Canal? Instead of becoming a greater national unit and a greater world power it will have lost a part of its sovereignty which no other acquisition could compensate. But even if this bill should be passed, even if it be the intention of its supporters that it shall forever settle the question of the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in favor of the British contention, I contend the question will not have been settled, because it will not have been rightly settled either in form or upon its merits. It might be settled for the balance of this presidential administration, but not longer. If the bill shall be enacted, the American people will try the question over again at the polls, and the result will be an American verdict. I am not permitted time to thoroughly here analyze the language of the treaty for the purpose of demonstrating that the language will not justify the British contention which upon the very face of it is so novel, so inconsistent, so unpatriotic from an American standpoint, as to seem intolerable and absurd. That it is ridiculous I need only instance that while Britain has gained the supremacy it claims upon the high seas by liberal subsidies granted to steamship lines, its position is on this question of construction that the United States shall not be permitted to even indirectly, by the exemption from the payment of canal tolls, grant a subsidy to its coastwise vessels. Mr. Speaker, I desire it to be understood that I am not opposing the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause upon the economic question now only incidentally involved. It is a fact I voted against this exemption amendment at the time it was adopted. I voted against it because I viewed it that the exemption constituted an indirect ship subsidy, and thus I gave effect to the prevailing sentiment of my constituents, which is against ship subsidies. Therefore it would be in perfect keeping with my vote heretofore expressed on the question if I now voted for the repeal bill, and I would do so if the administration forces would permit of an amendment consisting of a positive declaration that the United States adheres to its sovereign right to exempt American ships from tolls at any future time.

When I voted before, I committed myself only upon the question of the wisdom and justice of granting ship subsidies. To the question of the construction of the treaty I gave no consideration, because I was opposed to the exemption anyhow. At the present time it is the construction of the treaty which is paramount and controlling, and the vote expressed will be construed as being for or against the United States on that question. While the effect of my vote will be to continue the life of the tolls-exemption clause, I consider this as of very small moment compared with the importance of the question of our sovereignty which is involved.

Mr. Speaker, I grant that the United States is not to monopolize or try to make exclusive the benefits to be derived from this great improvement, thoroughly international in its scope and effect. I grant that the commerce of the world upon the high seas is to share in the benefits of the building of the canal. At the same time I maintain that the United States having constructed this canal in its own territory, under its own laws, with its own money, in its own right, is its owner, but as an enlightened nation will operate the canal much after the rules of a common carrier, allowing other nations the advantage of its use upon the payment of tolls fixed by the United States, but that such tolls must be "reasonable and equitable."

Mr. Speaker, I contend that the neutralization which the treaty binds our country to observe is that we treat all other nations alike; that we do not discriminate in favor of France or Germany or any other country as against England or any other country. I maintain, with equal confidence, that the terms of the treaty in no manner binds the United States that it require the payment of tolls by its coastwise vessels, because it may require British over-sea vessels to pay tolls. I maintain that to construe the treaty that it deprives the United States of the right to exempt its coastwise vessels from tolls would be equivalent to a construction placed upon the treaty that the United States could not grant a subsidy without England's consent.

Let me propound, what concern of Great Britain's or any other European or Asiatic country is it that we place our coastwise vessels upon a different footing than their over-sea lines? I contend that it is not legitimately their concern at all. Our coastwise vessels do not compete in any manner with their over-sea lines. Their over-sea lines have nothing at all to do with our coastwise trade, for already our coastwise vessels have a legal monopoly of the coastwise business. Great Britain did not grant a charter to the United States to construct the Panama Canal; neither has that country parted with any consideration for any benefit to be derived from the canal.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that the exemption from tolls constitutes an indirect subsidy and in legal effect must be treated as a subsidy, within the power of the United States to grant at its pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, I do not seek to preserve subsidy, but to maintain economic and legislative liberty.

Mr. Speaker, the foreign contention would require the United States to be better than the Golden Rule. It would require the American people to discriminate in favor of foreign countries as against themselves. For instance, while acquiescing in our treaty made with Colombia and Panama in 1903, for the exemption of their vessels, the foreign contention forbids our vessels the same privilege, in spite of the fact that besides being possessed of the territory through which the canal is constructed, the sole reason in favor of Colombia and Panama, there exists in favor of the United States the additional reason that it constructed the canal at its own cost and is the exclusive owner.

Mr. Speaker, with me it is not the economic question which we are now to determine, but one that is truly vital to the preservation of our Republic, that of its sovereignty, a question of national honor, country, home, and native land. [Applause.]

[Mr. CONNOLLY of Iowa addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. HELVERING addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that it has been thought advisable to bring up this question at this time. In all likelihood the question of tolls through the canal will not be a practical one for something like a year. No nation can afford to go to war with us or even abandon its friendly relations toward us simply because of a law enacted by Congress, which has not gone into operation and will not so go for some time to come. Non constat the law will never become effective.

Neither do I take kindly to the criticism of the Speaker of this House or the Democratic leader. They have a right to their opinions previously expressed, and particularly when the language of the Baltimore platform would seem to indorse their position. As much as some newspapers may desire it and the enemies of the party pray for it, there is no break in the ranks of our party. CLARK will continue to preside over the party with the same fairness and ability, and UNDERWOOD will continue to lead the party with patience, diplomacy, and success.

I remember on one occasion in a previous Congress the rank and file of us refused to follow CLARK and UNDERWOOD on a compromise measure, which they thought wise at the time, upon the subject of a tariff board. We rejected their advice at that time, but it did not mean a permanent separation of our forces. On the contrary, they took their defeat gracefully, and the Democratic membership rallied around their standard again with renewed energy and vigor. I am sure that whatever vituperation has been indulged in during this debate as against our leaders has found no responsive chord among the great rank and file of the Democrats of this House.

I have said this much, Mr. Speaker, as a preliminary to the statement that when this matter was before the House in the Sixty-second Congress I voted against free tolls for American ships. I thought then, and I think now, that the exemption was a case of flagrant subsidy of an existing monopoly. I did not believe then, nor do I believe now, that if this exemption be granted any benefit would result to the consumer. I believed then, and I believe now, that the shipowner would place this amount of toll in his own pocket. Why should not he? No foreign ship can compete with him in the coastwise trade, which constitutes the principal part of our seagoing traffic. He has no contract, nor is he under any legal obligation to give to the consumer that which Congress expressly gives to him, and to him only.

But it may be said free tolls would result in building more ships. If the business justifies it, I think this is true, but they could only be American ships, as to coastwise trade, and their owners would be subject to the same temptation to put the toll in their own pockets instead of generously distributing it among the people.

I am disturbed by one consideration only in the vote I shall cast, and that is the specific declaration of the platform since I voted upon this subject in the last Congress. As to that declaration, I have this to say: One part of the platform declares against bounties and subsidies in absolute and unequivocal terms, and then it proceeds specifically to declare for this particular subsidy. While I admit the general rule of law that when a general clause is followed by a specific one upon the same subject the latter controls, I do not think that this strict canon can be applied in the construction of party platforms where the specific clause repudiates the long and unbroken record of the party upon that subject.

In the second place, the platform can not bind anyone to break a treaty, which the Constitution declares to be the supreme law of the land. I grant you that Congress can by law repeal a treaty, but this should be done only in cases of extreme necessity, when the honor of the country and the great interests of the public are at stake. Certainly no such necessity exists when, in my opinion—and it is that which I propose to express by my vote—the repeal of the treaty only goes to the additional advantage of an already existing monopoly. To illustrate my position: If the treaty prohibited the fortification of the canal, I would vote to repeal it, because it is our canal; it was constructed with our money and we ought to defend it. On the tolls question, however, to exempt American ships would simply tax the people with an additional burden in favor of special privilege.

There is another thing I desire to say in connection with the platform. Is it not strange that the Democratic and Progressive platforms declare for free tolls, while the Republican platform is silent on the subject? We find a plank in our platform, which at the time attracted no attention, which is in violation of the unbroken record of our party on this subject, and which never became even a mentionable issue in the campaign. It was also placed in the Progressive Party's platform because it had no record on the subject, but is entirely ignored in the platform of the only party which has been the constant and loyal friend of the special interests. This is strange and peculiar, to say the least of it.

Mr. Speaker, under these circumstances, I am constrained to vote as I did before, against what I consider a special privilege to an existing monopoly.

[Mr. SINNOTT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. MOORE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, in May, 1912, when the Panama bill was under consideration I was one of four members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, from which this bill was reported, to file with the House of Representatives a minority report favoring free tolls for American ships engaged in the coastwise trade. At that time I was convinced that under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the granting of free tolls to American ships engaged in the coastwise trade could not be construed as a discrimination under the terms of the treaty. Coastwise trade is, and was at the time of the negotiations of the treaty, restricted by law to transportation exclusively in American ships, and ships of all other nations were and are prohibited from engaging therein. Therefore it appears that coastwise commerce in the very nature of things can not be affected by the terms of the treaty which relate to tolls.

The provision in the treaty relative to the terms of traffic on the canal reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It seems clear that the general statement in this clause regarding "terms of equality" is defined and limited by what follows, and therefore it becomes the attitude of the United States only to so adjust the question of tolls—> that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions and charges of traffic or otherwise.

I can not conceive how anyone can construe the language of this treaty and the subsequent developments of our purchase of the Canal Zone and the construction by the United States Government of the canal in any way except to permit this Government, in the matter of our domestic commerce, doing just exactly as it sees fit relative to the matter of tolls.

Subsequent to the passage of the Panama bill through the House of Representatives it was so altered in the Senate as to give free tolls to all American ships, whether in the domestic or foreign trade. It seemed to me that the treaty clearly forbade this being done, and I strongly opposed the action of the Senate, and when the conferees of the House finally reported back they had come to an agreement with the Senate, and the terms of the present law granting free tolls to American ships only in the coastwise trade was approved by both Houses and signed by President Taft.

This subject has incited more interest on the part of the American people than any other question that has been considered in Congress in the past 10 years. Some of the most eminent authorities in the country have discussed it. I am going to quote for the benefit of the House an extract from a speech made recently by Justice Samuel Seabury, of New York:

> The Panama Canal is an American waterway and not an international body of water. In the majority report of the congressional Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce it is claimed that the Panama Canal is not an American waterway, but is to be treated as if it were part of the open sea. This claim means that the United States has no more right in the Panama Canal than it has in the ocean, and that it has no proprietary rights in the canal which it has constructed through its own territory. It is settled international law that such artificial waterways as canals are part of the territory through which they pass. Upon this subject I read to you a short extract from the work of Mr. Oppenheim, the eminent English authority on international law. He says:
> "That canals are part of the territories of the respective territorial States is obvious from the fact that they are artificially constructed waterways. And there ought to be no doubt that all the rules regarding rivers must analogously be applied to canals. The matter needs no special mention at all, were it not for the interoceanic canals which have been constructed during the second half of the nineteenth century, or are contemplated in the future. And as regards one of these, the Emperor William Canal, which connects the Baltic with the North Sea, there is nothing to be said but that it is a canal made mainly for strategic purposes by the German Empire entirely through German territory. Although Germany keeps it open for navigation to vessels of all nations, she exclusively controls the navigation thereof, and can at any moment exclude foreign vessels at discretion, or admit them upon any conditions she likes, apart from special treaty arrangements to the contrary." (International Law, vol. 1, p. 554, sec. 543.)
> It is claimed on behalf of Great Britain that she only asks the United States to act toward Panama as she acts toward Suez. This claim is not true. Notwithstanding the provisions of the convention of Constantinople, Great Britain regards the Suez Canal as a proprietary body of water and not as an international waterway. England allowed France to construct the Suez Canal, and when it was finished England secured control of it. On the Mediterranean side of the canal she had possession of Gibraltar, Malta, and Cyprus, which she fortified. At the Red Sea outlet she acquired the Island of Perim, which she also fortified. Having secured and fortified these positions of advantage, Great Britain then occupied Egypt and excluded the French from any control over their own canal. Notwithstanding these aggressive steps, Great Britain claimed that she would observe the principle of neutrality in regard to the Suez Canal. When she had successfully stripped France of all her rights of control in the canal and completed her own control she formally repudiated the principle of neutrality. At the Paris commission in June, 1885, Sir Julian Pauncefote announced that the British delegates felt it their duty to formulate a general reservation as to the application of the treaty and plainly stated that while the British power continued in Egypt the principle of neutrality was not binding upon Great Britain. The Suez Canal, therefore, is not internationalized, but is under the exclusive control of Great Britain. It is evident, therefore, that Great Britain proclaims neutrality over the Suez Canal so that that policy may be made binding upon other powers and so that the United States may be regarded as bound to that policy in the Panama Canal. So far as Great Britain herself is concerned, she pays no heed to it. As a rule of conduct for others only she proclaims the necessity for neutrality in Suez and in Panama. She holds herself not bound by the rule that she applies to other nations, but acts always and everywhere consistent with the fundamental principles of her foreign policy, seizes whatever she can, holds all that she has, and proclaims loudly her desire to preserve equal rights and to distribute the benefits of her Christian civilization.

Great Britain has distinctly and specifically stated that the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not include coastwise trade. In its note of July 8, 1912, by Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires at Washington, addressed to the Secretary of State, Great Britain, after first protesting that the exemption of all vessels of the United States was a violation of the treaty, then concedes that as to the coastwise trade they could make no objection, saying that—if the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

It will be observed that this note was forwarded to our State Department after the Panama bill exempting coastwise trade had passed the House of Representatives and was pending in the Senate. The amendment to the bill giving free tolls to all ships in the United States had been offered, and the note of Mr. Innes, representing the English Government, was unquestionably filed with our State Department in an effort to offset legislation then contemplated in the Senate; and, as indicated in the note, the British Government at that time had not the slightest idea of protesting against what was ultimately determined. It was only after the debate in the Senate that it concluded to protest against the granting of free tolls to our coastwise trade. Great Britain has no right now to insist and this Government would be guilty of lack of courage of the gravest character if we agreed to the enactment of this legislation, based upon a subsequent protest of the English Government, without even submitting the question to arbitration.

Some of the greatest English authorities on international law have expressed it as their opinion, both privately and publicly, that the American Government has excellent grounds for maintaining its right to give free tolls to its own ships engaged in the coastwise trade, and to think that we should give this up without submitting it to some unbiased tribunal is, to say the least, a marvel of the age.

Secretary of State Knox has replied to the English objection against the exemption of American coastwise vessels, using these words:

American public opinion is so fully convinced that this country is right in the canal-tolls dispute with England and has such well-grounded suspicion that the whole English contention is in the interest of the English stock and bond holders in the Canadian Pacific and other Pacific railroads that popular interest in the notes exchanged between the foreign offices of the two countries is not keen. * * * Their will has been expressed by the act of Congress freeing American ships from tolls and if "diplomacy" tries to veto that decision diplomacy will get a bad upset."

The attitude of former President Roosevelt, who was President of the United States at the time of the making of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty and of the purchase of the Canal Zone from the Republic of Panama, is indicated in the following statement:

I believe the position of the United States is proper as regards coastwise traffic. I think we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic. There is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise trade from tolls. I believe the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway. * * * I do not think it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation * * * to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama and are doing this when every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind.

The union of American brains and American resources is bringing to a successful issue what is in many respects one of the most extraordinary engineering projects known to our civilization, either ancient or modern. We have bought and paid for the canal; we own it and the territory in which it is constructed, subject to the provisions of the treaties relating thereto. It is open to all the world upon terms of entire equality as between all nations of the world, and so far as we ourselves make international use thereof that equality as to ourselves is and will be maintained. We have the right and it is our duty to use it in connection with our local concerns not international in their character, in which no other country has any legitimate or proper concern, in such manner as in our judgment will best promote the welfare, prosperity, and happiness of the whole American people, and this we will do without the aid or consent, and, please God, if need be, against the protest of any foreign country.

[Mr. MAHAN addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that very much can be added to this debate by the discussion of the treaty or by reading the treaty, nor do I believe that you can change many minds in reference to their construction of the treaty. But, Mr. Speaker, the treaty does not in any way influence my vote on this question. If there had been no treaty with England I would vote just as I voted two years ago. I would vote to charge tolls on the ships of the coastwise Shipping Trust just as I would on other ships.

The question, so far as my vote is concerned, is one of public policy and principle. I am opposed to any sort of special privilege, and am applying a Democratic principle to this question.

For the purpose of comparison and to show my views I want to read the platform declarations of the Democratic Party in 1904 and 1908 and the two conflicting planks in the platform of 1912—and I want them in parallel columns in the RECORD:

PLATFORM OF 1904.

We denounce the ship subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of the merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

PLATFORM OF 1908.

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

PLATFORM OF 1912.

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the South, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

PLATFORM OF 1912.

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, presided over by that stalwart and able Democrat of Georgia, Mr. ADAMSON, reported from that Democratic committee to the House in 1912 a bill for the control of the canal. The bill as reported provided that American coastwise vessels should pay tolls. An amendment was offered to exempt American coastwise vessels, and a large majority of the Democrats voted against that amendment to the bill as reported by the Democratic Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, but the amendment was adopted by a small minority of the Democrats voting with the Republicans.

I am going to vote now as I voted then. I see no reason in principle why I should change. If it was wrong then, it is wrong now. I shall not complain because the President now stands where an overwhelming majority of the Democrats of the House stood in 1912 when this identical question was voted on. If this measure had been submitted to a Democratic caucus then there would never have been a free-tolls clause in the bill for the Coastwise Shipping Trust, for the Democratic caucus would have by a large majority voted against it, and we would not be here now trying to right a wrong that was done then.

Why did a majority of the Democrats then vote to make this Shipping Trust pay tolls on their ships passing through the canal? Because they knew it was a subsidy. The platform of 1904 and the platform of 1908 both declared in so many words against a ship subsidy. Those of us who voted not to take out of the Treasury money to operate this canal and give the service free of charge to this wicked coastwise ship monopoly were supporting the two last platforms of the national Democracy and the principles of Democracy for a century.

I represent here an agricultural district, and I have never voted to tax the farmers of my district for the benefit of a private monopoly, and I will never do so as long as I have the honor to represent them. They ask no special privilege for themselves, and I will never require them, with my vote, to grant a special privilege to anyone else.

Much partisan feeling has been manifested in this debate, which is certainly not necessary on this bill. When Mr. ADAMSON, two years ago, declined to make this a partisan measure, it was not discussed with partisan acrimony. If he had called, as he could have done, a Democratic caucus, his bill would have passed the caucus by a large majority, and the solid party vote could have been put behind the bill and it would have passed unamended, and we would never have had at this time this heated controversy. He has again declined to make it a caucus measure, and has acted wisely perhaps both times. It ill becomes gentlemen now to denounce those of us who are standing by our guns and for Democratic principles because a Democratic President sees fit to, by his action, indorse the wisdom of the vote of the majority of the Democrats in the House in 1912 who voted then as he now asks the balance of the House to vote.

The Republicans on the floor, from pure selfish political reasons, are assailing a Democratic administration and endeavoring to split the Democratic Party so that they may come back into power, and are not moved by any high sense of public duty or for patriotic reasons.

They accuse the President of surrendering to Great Britain. No such charge is warranted by the facts. We are not surrendering anything. Can anyone with common sense assert such a proposition? They brazenly assert that if we vote to charge the richest ship monopoly on the globe a reasonable toll to go through the canal that that is a surrender of our right to control the canal. This, it seems to me, is not even good nonsense. It is merely asserting our control and not surrendering it.

Oh; they say that it is upon Great Britain's demand. Not so with me. I don't care what Great Britain demands. Nor do I care what she contends. It would not influence my vote in the least. I vote for tolls because it is democratic and right. When I voted in 1912 for tolls this question was not even raised.

My understanding of the situation is this: Great Britain contends for equal treatment through the canal for her ships. Is this wrong? Has not the United States for over 100 years demanded this? Did not we fight the War of 1812 to get equal treatment on the seas? Has she not contended for equal treatment for her ships in every canal in the world? Has she not been accorded equal treatment? Does she not open up all her harbors and rivers to all the world and accord to every nation equal treatment? Does she not carry 89,000,000 tons of freight through the canals of Canada on equal terms with the Canadian and English ships? In other words, England in a perfectly friendly spirit is doing what the United States has always done since the Stars and Stripes appeared among the standards of the world, and that is asking equality of treatment of all ships of all nations on all navigable waters.

Why, Mr. Speaker, Members have actually worked themselves up to such a frenzy of rage that they say that before they would allow this Ship Trust to pay tolls they would fight. They say that it is England's greed and selfishness, and before they would allow England to control the canal they would fight. The ship-subsidy press applaud these statements. Why, when I said in a speech that before I would allow Japan to overturn the land laws of a sovereign State of this Union I would fight, they said that I was making a "jingo speech" and a "war speech" and called me all sorts of names. Why, of course, we would all fight before we would let England control the canal or before we would let Japan control the land laws of our States. The difference in the two cases is this, that when I made my speech on the California land question Japan was threatening to fight—or the papers said she was; of course, that does not make it so—if California passed through the legislature the alien-land acts; but England is not threatening anything. She has merely taken the position that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which we made with her in 1901 it is provided that the English ships should pay the same tolls as the ships of the United States.

While I do not intend to discuss at length the treaty, I desire to call attention to the first clause of article 3 of the treaty. I think even a casual reading of the clause will show that the language "free use of the canal" means clearly that all nations shall be treated alike and have free access to the canal upon paying the same tolls. The section reads as follows:

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts as a basis for the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially as embodied in the convention at Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This reads very much like it means that to me. I think every business man who would read this would at once say that the language "that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise" means what it says. So do I. But lawyers will differ.

But I do not care to go into this, although I have decided views upon it, because I am voting for tolls for a different reason. I would vote for tolls if there had never been a treaty. I am against exemption because I am against taxing the people for either "ship subsidy," "ship subvention," "railroad subsidy," or "railway subvention" in any and all forms.

My purpose in referring to the treaty was to show how men go wild in their extravagant statements that we surrendered for all time to come the control of the canal just because we saw fit and proper to repeal a law which we made year before last. It in no wise can affect or does affect our ownership or control of the canal.

Our right to the canal comes through the Republic of Panama. She ceded to us the Canal Zone for the purpose of building and operating a canal. It is true that we are not sovereign there, as has been stated by distinguished men on this floor. We are only there for the one specific purpose of building a canal. Our right is like that of a railroad to its right of way which has been deeded for railway purposes, and as long as a railroad is operated the title is good, but if the road is abandoned the title to the land reverts to the original owner, his heirs or assigns. For this right we gave a consideration and we have complied with the conditions, and as long as we operate a canal it is ours. We can fix tolls or no tolls, and can regulate it as we see fit and proper, and the only condition is that we must be fair with all nations who will comply with our rules and desire to use it. I would favor this without a treaty. We ought to be fair and just as a Nation, treaty or no treaty.

Mr. Speaker, as I have just stated, it is not on account of the treaty that I favor the coastwise vessels paying tolls, but in addition to the reasons already assigned another economic reason is that our Government expenses are increasing at an alarming rate and taxation of the people is rapidly increasing. It is our duty, as I see it, so far as we can to make enterprises like this self-sustaining, and not tax the people to keep it up for the benefit of a private monopoly like the Ship Trust in America. This is the most absolute monopoly in the world, and made so by our wicked coastwise laws of over a hundred years, and ought, of course, to be repealed, and I have favored their repeal since I have been in Congress. No ship not built wholly by the American shipbuilding monopoly can engage in the coastwise trade. If a merchant in Gulfport, Miss., wanted to ship goods to Galveston, Tex., by water, he is compelled to pay enormous rates, because if an English or German ship was at the dock in Gulfport and was bound for Galveston, and had room for the freight, under the wicked law a heavy fine would be imposed if such ship should undertake to carry the goods. The Gulfport merchant must wait until a vessel of the American coastwise monopoly comes along before he can ship his goods.

Mr. Speaker, this question is one in which the South should be particularly interested. Not because the Panama Canal will affect us so much directly, but because if the United States should reverse her policy of equal treatment of the ships of all of the nations, the nations could and would have the right to treat us as we treat them. There are 30 treaties which the United States has with other nations, and if we fail to give them equal treatment, they could greatly embarrass our foreign trade by discrimination against us. We of the South produce practically all of the cotton of the world, and two-thirds of our raw cotton is shipped abroad, and at least one-half of our manufactured cotton is sold abroad. What would happen to our cotton trade with the world? England takes the greatest share of southern cotton and has certainly been the South's best customer, and if England and all the other nations should discriminate against an American ship loaded with American cotton goods or southern cotton, it might affect our southern cotton interests greatly.

All of these international treaties have a general principle of fair treatment of all nations in them, and are construed, so far as we are concerned, largely as we construe our treaties. A departure on the part of the United States from our stand of more than a century from this principle will be fraught with peril to our people and to our commerce. The South would be first to suffer, because we supply all the cotton which constitutes the greater part of our foreign trade. The South wants the friendship of all nations above any section of this Union, because the best customers of the southern cotton farmer are the foreign nations. This trade is now prospering and growing. Let us of the South do nothing to check it. I certainly would not jeopardize our trade relations solely for the benefit of this coastwise monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, the older Members of the House remember when, some years ago, a Member of this House was in the Hawaiian Islands with his committee on Governmnet business, and received a cablegram that a member of his family was dangerously ill and calling him home at once. An English ship was to sail for San Francisco in a few hours, and no American ship would sail in some days. He applied for passage on the English ship and was informed by the captain that it was a violation of the law of the United States for any ship other than an American coastwise ship to carry him, but that if he would put up a fine of $200, to be paid for the violation of the law, under the circumstances he would be given passage. So the Member was compelled to put up with the captain of the vessel this sum of money in addition to his passage. At San Francisco the fine was paid, and Congress passed a bill to refund him his money. If he had not been a Member of Congress, how many years do you suppose it would have been before he could have gotten it refunded? This is the extent to which this monopoly is protected, and now they want further protection and privilege by having the taxpayers of America pay the cost of putting their ships through the canal. They will never get this with my vote.

Let me give you one illustration of how they are robbing the American people. According to a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated March 19, 1914, the rate on coal from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean for the Navy, if carried in American constwise monopoly ships, was as follows:

Rate, 1912, $7.50 to $8 per ton, according to destination.
Rate, 1913, $5.50 to $7.32 per ton.
The foreign-ship rate was, in 1912, $4.78 to $6.93; and in 1913, $3.50 to $6.15 per ton.

This shows how patriotic the coastwise monopoly Ship Trust is. They charge the taxpayers $1.07 to $2.72 more per ton to carry coal for the Navy than do foreign ships. They thus robbed the taxpayers, notwithstanding the law is in their favor to this extent. It is a violation of the law for any American citizen to ship anything at any rate in any other than one of their ships. How much they have taken from the American people in outrageous charges in the last 100 years no man can estimate.

Mr. Speaker, the cry on this bill of a base surrender to England is the same old Republican cry for the past 50 years. Every time the Democrats have reduced the tariff the protected barons of industry cry "base surrender to England" and "cowardly surrender of our markets to Europe" and all such rot. These men of vast wealth, who have enjoyed a special privilege for many years, have grown to believe that it is their vested right to continue to exploit the American people, and if Congress undertakes to take it away from them they cry aloud through their privileged press and denounce all men who would disturb them in their monopoly.

The Standard Oil monopoly levies tolls at will upon the American people. So does the Beef Trust, Copper Trust, Steel Trust, Railroad Trust, and all the tariff barons, and now, when Congress attempts to make a giant Shipping Trust pay a reasonable toll for carrying their ships through the Panama Canal, which cost the American people more than $400,000,000 to build, they cry out, "It is a base surrender to England."

Who are behind this demand for free passage for trust ships through the canal? It is well to know. The Standard Oil Co. owns ships which they would put through for nothing. The Beef Trust owns ships which they would put through for nothing. The transcontinental railroads own ships which they would put through for nothing. All the coastwise ships are practically owned by two companies, which are in a combination, which they would put through for nothing. These are the people who would appropriate the canal to their own private use and tax all the balance of the 100,000,000 of American citizens to maintain and operate the canal. The canal, then, would not be ours, Mr. Speaker; it would be theirs—that is, it would be the property of the Standard Oil, Beef Trust, Steel Trust, and Coastwise Shipping Trust, while all those who labor in the field, the factory, and the mine would be taxed to pay for the operation of the canal to keep it up and to maintain an Army and Navy at the canal to defend it. In such a case these giant monopolies would be the sole beneficiaries of the canal.

Has all the patriotism fled from the hearts and minds of all the people except the owners of the Standard Oil, the Beef Trust, and the Ship Trust? Have all the Members of Congress who fail to do their bidding surrendered to England? Has it come to pass that unless we stand and deliver over to these wicked monopolies the sole use and benefit of the canal we are cowards and dastards? Is it a base surrender to refuse to do the bidding of these men?

No, Mr. Speaker; but I submit that it would be a base surrender of every Democratic principle to surrender the free use of this great property of all the American people to these few trust barons who would further rob the people who toil and produce the wealth of this Nation.

I appeal to the Members of the House not to surrender to these men this canal, but to stand by the Democratic principle which is as old as the party and is the very test and touchstone of Democracy—"special privilege to none." Let us uphold the hands of the President in this great fight against special privilege and stand by the record of the majority of the Democrats in the Sixty-second Congress.

When this matter was up in the House of Representatives in the last Congress, nearly a two-thirds majority of the Democrats voted on the roll call, in the presence of the country, against free tolls, and by a vote of the majority of Republicans this measure was placed upon the statute book; and when we find Democrats here now advocating this Republican measure you find that the applause comes from the Republican side of the House and those who believe in ship subsidies. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is no need of our mincing words about it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has just spoken to you, himself admits that it is a subsidy. If this is a subsidy, then I want everybody here to take the platform of the Democratic Party and read it carefully, and he will find that it will be utterly impossible for him to comply with both planks of the platform.

Those of you who vote against this bill will violate the platform just as much as those of us who vote for the bill. The difference is that when a Democrat votes for free tolls to the coastwise vessels he votes for a Republican doctrine, while those of us who vote against free tolls vote for a Democratic principle as old as the party and for every platform in its entire history. The free-tolls plank can not be relied upon any more than the other plank which declares against subsidy. I shall not take the Republican path, but will adhere to the old, time-honored principle of the party and vote as I think every friend of the masses should vote—that is, for tolls.

Then how shall I decide that issue? I go back to the father of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, who tells me that democracy is a Government with equal rights for all and special privileges for none. Is this a special privilege? Let me invite your attention to a situation that will occur in reference to the Panama Canal. If two men, living in New York, should each build a ship on the same day, build duplicate ships, and after having built the ships one of them engages in the foreign trade and the other in the coastwise trade, A, who has the first ship, costing the same as the ship that B has, loads his ship with a cargo for Seattle, Wash., through the canal, and B loads his ship for Victoria, Canada, with identically the same goods, with identically the same tonnage, both being American ships, and they start on their voyage; when they get to the canal you will find that A goes through the canal for nothing with his goods bound for Seattle, while B, another American citizen, with identically the same cargo of the same identical weight—we will say for argument's sake of 10,000 tons—pays $12,000 to get his ship through. B pays $12,000, whereas A goes through for nothing. What is that situation? What sort of a special privilege is A enjoying there? A has his ship protected so that no foreign ship can compete for one pound of freight that he hauls. He belongs to a monopoly which, according to the record in this case, is controlled by two great ship companies, which constitute the most gigantic trust and have been the most wicked trust for 100 years, while B has to go into open competition with the ship companies of all the world to get his cargo bound to Victoria, Canada. If you are going to make a difference here, the subsidy ought to be in favor of the man who is bound to a foreign port for the sake of the extension of the foreign trade. This extension of foreign trade might help the South. This coastwise shipping can not help us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some men say this is not a subsidy. Let us see. It costs, according to the estimates, from $1,500 to $4,000 to get a ship through the canal. That money is being paid directly out of the Treasury. When A goes through with his cargo the American people, the masses of the people, the farmers, the merchants, the lawyers, the doctors, all the people of the Nation, are taxed to keep up that canal, and are taxed from $1,500 to $4,000 out of the Treasury to get his cargo through. That being true, he is getting a direct subsidy out of the Treasury in taking his ship through.

In addition to that, he gets this exemption which another American citizen engaged in the same business, under the present law, can not get; and as long as I am a Member of this House, as long as I shall have the honor to represent the people that I represent now, I shall never give my vote to that sort of a proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because from the beginning of the Government down to the present, ever since the organization of the Democratic Party, we have been opposed to all special privileges and subsidies; and when I vote for tolls now I vote just as a majority of the Democrats voted in 1912. I see no reason on earth why I should change now, when it is utterly impossible for a man construing the platform as I do, construing it as the gentleman from Illinois does, construing it as all men will who study the question, to stand on both of these planks of the platform, because one of them goes in one direction and the other one goes in another direction.

I do not blame the Republicans who are opposing this bill who have supported a ship subsidy in the past; but wherever you find a Republican on that side of the House who has always been opposed to a ship subsidy and voted against ship subsidy when Republican majorities were in control in the House, you will find every one of them now voting to repeal this clause which we propose to repeal, and the vast majority of Republicans voting against repeal; they recognize a subsidy when they see it, and for that reason are for it. Why can not our Democrats see this?

That being true, what does the President ask us to do? He has been assailed and has been charged with being guilty of dishonor to his own country. No one who knows Woodrow Wilson will believe for a moment that that charge is made against him from any other than a partisan spirit and for any other purpose than that of obtaining a partisan advantage in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And I am one of those who believe that that treaty says just exactly what it means. I am at an utter loss to know what Great Britain could have gained by this proposition if, after she entered into that treaty and took upon herself the obligation she did, the only thing she is to get out of it is equal treatment with France, Germany, and the other nations. It seems to me the clear meaning is that England should get the same treatment for her ships that the United States gives to hers.

Some gentlemen have referred to our rivers and harbors. Yes; they are free, and I will come nearer voting to make the canal free to all vessels of the world than I will to vote to give the most wicked monopoly in the United States such an absolute subsidy, when it has granted the American people no protection. Go down, if you will, into south Mississippi, and consult with the people in Florida and in Texas, who have to ship their lumber by the coastwise vessels. Ask the shippers of lumber what treatment and concessions they have gotten from this wicked monopoly, and without a single exception, so far as I know, they will all tell you that it has been the most arbitrary crowd with which they have ever had to deal.

If that be true, then what other plank in our platform are we violating? The platform made at Baltimore denies emphatically that any duty should ever be placed upon trust-made goods. Do we carry out that platform? These gentlemen who are now crying loudest and who are making the most fuss about standing by the platform said not one word in all the tariff debate in reference to that plank in the platform. Then, as to another plank in the platform, if you will look in the RECORD you will find that my Democratic friends and colleagues who are now claiming that we ought to stick to the platform did not do so when the Cullop amendment was up on the bill to create a new judgeship introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. On the contrary, you will find that nearly all of these gentlemen voted against the platform and voted against the provision in that bill requiring the President to publish the names of those men who recommended the judge.

Now, gentlemen, there is another great privilege which these gentlemen have that has not been talked about here. This is the greatest monopoly in the country, and yet under the tariff law all materials for the building of ships that engage in the coastwise trade are on the free list. You could go to the Clyde and buy a vessel for $500,000 that will cost $1,000,000 in America, but you can not buy a Clyde-built ship and put her in the coastwise trade, not even after you have paid the tariff on it. Yet these gentlemen who have this privilege are demanding the additional special privilege of taxing the masses of the American people to pay the expense of carrying their vessels through the Panama Canal. That proposition, gentlemen of the House, will never receive my vote. You may say, if you please, that I do not stand upon the platform; but I am standing upon my conscience; I am standing upon the principles for which Democracy has stood in the past. Any man who will take the Baltimore platform and construe it will find it is utterly impossible to comply with both provisions. That being true, I shall resolve the question in favor of that principle of Democracy which I most believe in and which I have adhered to since I have been old enough to have an opinion upon the subject. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not question the integrity or the patriotism of the gentlemen who entertain different opinions upon this momentous question from those which I hold.

I know they are just as honest in their views as we are, and their course is actuated by as high a patriotism as could fill the hearts of any men whose actions were based solely upon a desire to secure the greatest good to our people and the greatest glory to our country. [Applause.]

The able and distinguished Speaker of the House and the successful and beloved leader of the majority here could not if they would, and would not if they could, act otherwise. [Applause.]

Few Speakers of the House, during all of its history, have had the affection and respect of its membership to a greater degree than CHAMP CLARK; and he looms bigger than ever to-day, both in our affection and our admiration, as we see him standing for what he believes to be right against all odds. [Applause.]

I followed the flag of OSCAR UNDERWOOD in the varying fortunes of the contest for the presidential nomination of my party in 1912, and I was never prouder of him than I am now, when I see him throwing aside every consideration of policy and self-interest to maintain his convictions. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Speaker, the best and ablest men are liable to err; and I believe that these gentlemen and those who are acting with them are wrong from every standpoint upon the pending bill. [Applause.]

I have never voted against a platform declaration of my party, and when I do so on this occasion, it will be by authority of another provision of the same platform.

The platform of 1912 contains a plank favoring the exemption which this bill repeals; but that platform also contains a provision against ship subsidies. This declaration is a time-honored principle of Democracy, the first one I referred to is new to our party. In my opinion, the two declarations are diametrically opposed; if you vote for one you must vote against the other, for this exemption is, beyond doubt, a subsidy.

It is not surprising that in the excitement and turmoil and strife of the Baltimore convention that an inconsistency here and there should have crept into the platform, which was adopted at the end of the convention, when committee and delegates alike were exhausted.

When such an inconsistency occurs I believe it is the right of every man to choose which of the conflicting provisions shall control his actions without subjecting himself to the charge of disloyalty to his party platform. [Applause.]

I have chosen to stand for the time-honored Democratic doctrine against ship subsidies.

That the exemption is a subsidy to ships which would carry the coast-to-coast trade I have no doubt. In determining the rate of tolls to be charged for passage through the canal the tonnage of all vessels, including that carried in American coastwise vessels, was taken into account and the apportionment made on the entire tonnage, and under the exemptions the tolls allotted to coastwise vessels are not collected. I fail to see how a more direct subsidy could be given to these ships. [Applause.]

I am unalterably opposed to the policy of subsidizing shipowners under the pretext of building up a merchant marine. Let us stand by the Democratic doctrine against these subsidies and recur to the old historical precedents and policies of the period, when under Democratic administration we had a merchant marine of which the whole country was proud. In 1860 we had the second largest merchant marine in the world. Our sails whitened every harbor and our flag floated on every breeze under the heavens.

I am for the bill because I believe the exemption which it repeals is in contravention of the treaty of November 18, 1901, in relation to the canal. [Applause.]

The treaty provides that the canal shall be open to the vessels of all nations observing the rules prescribed on terms of entire equality.

It was entered into by Great Britain, at our instance, in order to abrogate that provision of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which absolutely forbade this country from building any canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans in this region without the assent of Great Britain.

In this House and in this country there is a difference of opinion as to the true interpretation of that language, but in the minds of millions of Americans, including the responsible head of the Government, and in the opinions of all other Governments and peoples of the earth the meaning of the words of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is as plain and clear as the noonday sun and stands no more in need of interpretation than the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." [Applause.]

The President has unreservedly announced his full acceptance of this view, and has told this House and proclaimed to the world that the honor and public faith of this country is distinctly pledged to grant the use of the canal to the ships of all nations, including those flying the American flag, on terms of equality and without discrimination.

Had I any doubt as to the meaning of the language of this treaty, which I have not, and did I believe that free tolls for American coastwise shipping was of vast economic value to the country at large, and not merely a thinly veiled subsidy to the coastwise shipping monopoly, as I do believe it to be, I would, nevertheless, feel it to be my plain public duty and the plain duty of Congress to support the President before the world in the position he has taken. [Applause.]

In the hands of the President are the foreign relations of the country; he is necessarily better informed as to the needs and exigencies of those relations than Members of Congress can be. Is Congress prepared to flout and discredit him by refusing to adopt a course which he tells us the honor and interest of the country demand should be taken?

Is Congress prepared to stand by its interpretation of an international contract, when that interpretation is at variance with the interpretation placed upon that contract by every other nation in the world?

I know of no ground upon which we could defend such action, except upon that maxim so often attributed to the Jesuits, namely, "That the end justifies the means." The famous Florentine writer upon "Statecraft," Machiavelli, openly and unblushingly undertook to defend and justify this maxim as a precept of political ethics. In his work entitled "The Prince" he lays it down as a cardinal precept which should govern rulers, that if you can accomplish your ends without breaking your faith you ought to do it, but if to accomplish your ends it is necessary to violate your faith do not hesitate to do so. His political philosophy has been summarized in these two lines:

> The promise given was a necessity of the past,
> The word broken is a necessity of the present.

Opponents of the measure have charged that Great Britain has taken advantage of an international complication to press a dishonest advantage and that President Wilson has yielded to demands which are unjust to the American people.

There is no evidence to support this charge, which is absolutely untrue and which is unjust to England and insulting to the President.

It is popular in some quarters to twist the British lion's tail, but the great body of the American people are friendly to England, just as the great body of the English people are friendly to America. [Applause.]

England has done nothing in the tolls matter except to place the same construction on the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that other nations have done; that many Americans have done; that President Wilson has done; and if nothing more happens than this to disturb the friendship which exists between these two great nations, the celebration of the anniversary of the hundred years of peace between them can be glorified as opening another long era of amity and friendship.

In the bitterness of this debate President Wilson has been assailed and his motives impugned. These criticisms will not injure him. [Applause.]

As a public servant he has been tried to the uttermost and never found wanting; he has ever been unswerving in the performance of his public duty; his administration will add to the prosperity and glory of the country, and his name will be written high upon the scanty scroll of the Nation's really great Presidents. [Applause.]

Now, as the head of his Government, he simply asks Congress to enable him to place his country where we all hope she will ever stand—the embodiment of a well-kept faith, the incarnation of national honor. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, a bold, brave man and a righteous Nation can always afford to do right. [Applause.] To do the right is not humiliation, it is exaltation. To do the right is not loss, it is gain. To do the right is not surrender, it is victory. [Applause.]

The President has urged Congress to repeal that section of the Panama Canal law which exempts coastwise ships passing through the canal from the payment of tolls. He bases his recommendation on two grounds: First, that the law is unsound economically; and, second, that the law violates our treaty obligations.

In my judgment both propositions are true. Either being true, our duty is plain.

On the first proposition, which is political in its character, every Democrat should align himself with the President. The second proposition touches our national and our international honor and should command the enthusiastic support of all Americans.

The Congress has never refused to support a President in his foreign policy, no matter whether such policy spelt peace or war. A mere suggestion that President McKinley was embarrassed by a situation arising out of our foreign relations and complications caused Congress to pass unanimously a bill placing $50,000,000 at his disposal. Congress did not know how he would expend the money, and Congress did not inquire how he would use it. All that Congress wanted to know, and all that Congress did know, was that the President, who is peculiarly charged with our foreign relations, was embarrassed and needed the help of the lawmaking body. Congress trusted William McKinley in that crisis. Then there were no attempts to secure party advantages, nor were there any insinuating resolutions of inquiry.

This Congress is going to support, sustain, and trust Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.] It is to be regretted that the action will not be unanimous. When the President, who stands out as a moral and an intellectual giant, shall have met the situation that now embarrasses him with such wisdom that our national and international honor will be without blemish and all Americans will rejoice at the outcome, nobody will regret the division of to-day more than our erring brethren. [Applause.]

The newspapers that antagonize the administration and the Democratic Party print with delight under great headlines that all the leaders are arrayed against the President. The generals are against the President; but, thank God, the army is for him! [Applause.] Since the sons of men fought for glory, the courage, patience, and hardships of the privates in the ranks have reflected honor on the generals. The leaders of this House could not point with pride to their splendid record of achievement and accomplishment but for the patience, industry, and fidelity of many Members who have not been in the limelight. The leaders may falter and fall by the wayside, but the army will move on steadily over the breastworks and to victory.

The first proposition which the President submits as his reason for asking Congress to repeal the tolls-exemption law is that it is economically unsound. The Panama Canal, when completed, will have cost the United States in round numbers $400,000,000. It is the greatest engineering feat and the most expensive enterprise ever undertaken by man. The annual cost of maintenance, protection, and operation, and 2½ per cent interest on the investment will be not less than $25,000,000, and it may reach $50,000,000. Shall the American people continue to pay taxes and pay the expenses of maintenance, operation, and protection, or shall the canal be made wholly or partly self-sustaining by charging tolls to ships that pass through it? As for my part I do not hesitate to say that I believe the ships should pay tolls.

The Democratic Party, from Jefferson to Woodrow Wilson, has insisted upon the cardinal doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." If it is not special privilege to allow a few people to use this great waterway free of charge, then it would be difficult to find an instance of special privilege.

There has been injected into this debate some very pleasing catch phrases. While there is no argument in catch phrasing I realize the danger of it. We are asked if it is not "our canal," and if we did not spend "our money" in building it, and why we may not send "our ships" through it and do with it as we please. The difficulty about the situation is that "our money" did build the canal and it belongs to "us"—to all the people of the United States. The ships referred to are not "our ships." The ships referred to belong to a few private individuals who are so fortunate as to be able to engage in our very profitable coastwise trade. If you would have all the people who own the canal share the full benefits of the canal, you can easily do that by letting the ships that pass through it pay tolls. The tolls will be turned into the Treasury of the United States and will belong to the same people that the canal belongs to.

The shipping interests ought to be willing to pay these reasonable tolls, for all of our coastwise ships passing from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast by reason of the canal will save 8,000 miles. It is expensive to operate ships and it costs large sums of money to sail ships 8,000 miles. Therefore by going through the canal, even after paying the moderate tolls that have been fixed, the shippers will be immensely profited.

It is said in this debate that there is a plank in the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 which provides for the exemption of our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. Our Republican friends and all the organs of special privilege are particularly insistent that that plank in our platform shall be carried out. The devil quotes the Scriptures for selfish and wicked purposes. The Republicans and the organs of special privilege are not quoting the Democratic platform for the good of the Democratic Party. It is the first time in half a century that the Republican Party, Mr. Speaker, almost unanimously, is willing to vote to carry out a plank in a Democratic platform. The truth is that that doctrine has always been a Republican tenet and has always commanded practically the solid vote of the Republicans and a solid Democratic vote on the other side. I do not know how that particular sentence got into the Democratic platform, but I do know this: In the very paragraph in which that expression occurs will be found the following:

We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

On this same subject the platform of 1904 said:

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

In 1908 we again expressed the Democratic position on this question as follows:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

So it is obvious that the particular plank which has attracted so much attention is absolutely inconsistent with and repugnant to the preceding sentences, which deny that the public should bear the expense of building up a merchant marine. Inasmuch as the two propositions are inconsistent, it seems to me the only safe course to follow is to take that which is fundamental and which is in accord with the entire history of the Democratic Party from the days of Thomas Jefferson to the present.

The next proposition is that this solemn treaty which we have entered into with England is violated by the law exempting coastwise ships from the payment of tolls. The question of constructing the Isthmian Canal has been discussed for 400 years. The Government of the United States and the Government of Great Britain entered into the Clayton-Bulwer treaty looking to the construction of a canal as far back as 1850. Section 8 of that treaty is as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

After the Spanish-American War the question again became very acute, and the United States and Great Britain modified the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. The treaty of 1901 was intended to modify and supersede the treaty of 1850, but "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." And the last treaty provides that—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The President stated in his address to Congress that however we might debate the question in the United States, in all other countries it has but one interpretation. All the nations of the world believe that either ignorantly we have misinterpreted or willfully we have violated the terms of that treaty. The United States is too big and broad a Nation to put itself in the attitude of claiming a doubtful advantage for itself and being put down by all the nations of the world as an outlaw.

We can do three things under the circumstances. We can repeal the law exempting coastwise ships from the payment of tolls; we can arbitrate the question, which Great Britain has indicated willingness to do; or we can refuse to arbitrate.

The honor of this Republic is certainly safe in the hands of the present Executive. His record and his character are such as to justify the belief that we need not fear to grant to him in ungrudging measure what he has asked us to do. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON].

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the great majority on the Democratic side of this House finds itself in the pending contest over the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act apart from its usual leaders. We have followed the distinguished gentleman from Alabama in many a contest for Democratic principles. In the days when the light of Democratic power was just breaking over the political horizon the Speaker himself, then the minority leader, stood in the forefront of the struggle that was impending between the hosts of democracy and the shattered forces of a tory republicanism. Certainly no man in this House with knowledge of the character or integrity of purpose of the Speaker or Mr. UNDERWOOD can condemn them for their present views. They no doubt come from deep convictions as the result of a deliberately matured judgment. They are maintained with the same high sense of patriotism as are the views of those who support the urgent request of the President for the passage of the repeal bill. But as the years go by I firmly believe that each of them will realize that, with perfect adherence to their views of a proper American policy regarding the Panama Canal, they might yet have consistently cooperated, along with other men of equal patriotism on both sides of this House, to carry through the repeal because of the large international vision and mind in which the President has conceived that measure.

I want to assure my Republican friends, however, that such a situation does not mean the devoutly prayed-for rupture in the Democracy which is the sole hope for the future of their repudiated national party. When the national policies of a progressive Democracy, in the interest of the masses, again engage the attention of this House so-called Democratic disruption will be to your astonished gaze a dissolving view.

In this debate there has been much superior canting about their patriotism by opponents of the President. Mr. Speaker, a service of some years in this House has, in fact, convinced me that its membership is a body of high-minded and patriotic men. Whatever their views upon public questions, or to whatever party they may adhere, it is only from the chance and misplaced blatant enthusiast that one hears cavil about doubtful motive or cringing fear of Members. Upon both sides of the aisle the spirit of elevated Americanism is equally strong and alert, and there should be no sympathy for him who would make a party shibboleth of patriotism.

At the time the Panama Canal act was passed, in 1912, I voted and spoke in favor of the provision which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal. I believed then, and still believe, that the theory and fabric of our Constitution contemplates an untaxed commerce between the States. The entire policy of our Government in the improvement and construction of our national waterways has undoubtedly been to permit our interstate commerce to pass over these waterways without any charge or toll. Viewed, therefore, solely as a domestic policy, I do not agree with the President that the exemption would be an economic mistake. As an opponent of subsidy or discriminating duties, if we were to-day passing an act of Congress relating to the canal free and apart from international obligations, I would still preserve the fundamental conception of the fathers of the Constitution, a free interstate commerce, and I would by regulation of rates and practices through the instrumentality of the Interstate Commerce Commission prevent the coastwise shipowners, rather than the people, from becoming the beneficiaries of a free water-way policy at Panama. Holding to those governmental and economic views, it would be violence to my integrity of thought if I did not have the courage still to say so.

But, Mr. Speaker, the economic policy of the United States with respect to tolls on the vessels of its citizens passing through the Panama Canal has ceased to be important. The international aspect of the question of the exemption of our vessels in the coastwise trade has undoubtedly become serious and controlling to our action at this time. The President, with his intimate knowledge of international thought, and his close contact with the diplomats of the nations of the world, declared in his message:

> But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

The President is not asking Congress to reverse its opinions as to the economic propriety of the free-tolls clause. All that he desires is that Congress proceed now to meet an international situation which has arisen. Since the original Panama Canal act was passed nation after nation has taken the position with Great Britain that the exemption of American coastwise vessels is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. South America has joined with the nations of Europe and Asia, so that at the present time all the world is arrayed against the United States and is questioning the good faith of this country. Under those circumstances the President says to the Congress, in the language of the late Senator Hoar, "Never so to act as to place your country's interest above your country's honor."

There is much stress laid upon the proposition that the policy of tolls exemption was declared in the Democratic national platform of 1912. It is vigorously asserted that the President can not announce a Democratic Party policy upon tolls, but that the solemn declarations of its members in convention assembled is the party program. If the question at issue were simply to determine whether there shall be adherence to the views of the President of our party or the solemn platform declarations of our party upon a legitimate policy of national legislation, I should unhesitatingly declare that it is the duty of Democrats who have regard for their obligations to adhere to the pledge which the party gave to the American people.

But the President has not urged the repeal as a party policy. He has appealed to the American Congress, regardless of party, to meet an international situation. No political party has the right to declare in its platform a policy which may involve the violation of a treaty between the United States and a foreign power, and then demand adherence to that policy regardless of consequence. Treaties made with foreign nations are the supreme law of the land, anything in acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. We may have declared in our platform for a trade policy of reciprocity with a particular nation, but if it were found that that policy infringed upon treaty obligations with a number of other nations it would not only be just, but our honest, patriotic duty to abandon the platform pledge. We may have declared a policy of trade discrimination to favor our relations with one of our own small possessions over seas. That policy might so abridge or violate our existing trade agreements with foreign nations as inevitably to plunge us into a great international trade war. It can not be conceived that it would be the duty of our party representatives in this House to adhere to that policy because we had pledged it, and bring a great trade war upon the American people. So it is easy to see that there are circumstances under which party promises in platforms become impossible of performance.

Now, the tolls-exemption plank in the Democratic platform pledged the party explicitly to an "ex parte" construction of an already executed and operative treaty with a foreign nation. Moreover, at the time the Baltimore convention was assembled and the tolls-exemption plank embodied in its platform those relatively few persons who were actually concerned with the insertion of the plank felt that it was the mere announcement of a national economic policy.

Here is a situation, therefore, where a declaration in a party platform ceases to be a promise, because it is impossible of performance, and it is simply ridiculous to say that a vote, regardless of that declaration, in order to sustain the President in what he urges, is a violation of a party pledge.

It is quite true that the Constitution confers no power upon the President and the Senate to make a treaty in conflict with the Constitution itself, but there is no lawyer who has dared to assert that a treaty which merely makes commercial concessions to foreign vessels and trade for the enjoyment by them of equality of treatment with the coastwise vessels and trade of the United States infringes any constitutional provision. And whether one believes such concession was actually made in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is not to the point. It is the well-nigh universal international public opinion that such concession was made, and that the existing exemption violates its spirit.

Much comment has been made upon this floor about the dictatorial attitude of the President in urging the tolls-exemption repeal bill. It has frequently been said that he should simply advise Congress about the matter, state his full diplomatic reasons, and leave the legislative body to its own coordinate initiative. Let us see if that be true.

The President is the medium of all intercourse, communication, and negotiations between the United States and other governments. By him are all treaties initiated. Under the express language of the Constitution "he shall receive the ambassadors and other public ministers."

In 1793 Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, wrote to the French minister that as the President was the only channel of communication between the United States and foreign nations it was from him alone "that foreign nations are to learn what is or has been the will of the Nation."

And in the minutes of a conversation between Mr. Jefferson, Secretary of State, and M. Genet, the French minister, on July 10, 1793, is found the entry:

> He asked if they—Congress—were not the sovereign. I told him no; they were sovereign in making laws only, the Executive was sovereign in executing them, and the judiciary in construing them where they related to their department. "But," said he, "at least Congress are bound to see that the treaties are observed." I told him no; there were very few cases, indeed, arising out of treaties which they could take notice of; that the President is to see that treaties are observed. "If he decides against the treaty, to whom is a nation to appeal?" I told him the Constitution had made the President the last appeal.

William Wirt, when Attorney General, in a great opinion, has said (1 Atty. Gen. Op., 566):

> The United States, in taking the rank of a nation, must take with it the obligation to respect the rights of other nations. This obligation becomes one of the laws of the country to the enforcement of which the President, charged by his office with the execution of all our laws, and charged in a particular manner with the superintendence of our intercourse with foreign nations, is bound to look.

So completely is the President the guardian of the foreign relations of the United States that he may withdraw treaties pending their consideration by the Senate. Jefferson withheld from the Senate the treaty negotiated in London in 1806 by Monroe and Pinkney. President Arthur in 1885 recalled a treaty with Belgium. President Cleveland withdrew for examination in 1885 treaties submitted by his predecessor—President Arthur—with Spain and Nicaragua, and likewise in 1893 with the provisional governments of the Hawaiian Islands.

With a firm faith in his patriotic impulses, with the fresh memory of a year of remarkably courageous performance in the interest of the people, and with a knowledge of repeated examples of his dauntless fidelity to high purpose regardless of personal or party considerations, who will now doubt the President's veracity and demand a bill of particulars of the diplomatic information which comes confidentially to him in his high place? For myself, as a matter of sincere public duty, I recognize his lofty aim to end an international misunderstanding, and I support him not merely as the head of my party but as the responsible Executive of the American people.

It may be true that the proper construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty assures the right of the United States to exempt its vessels in the coastwise trade, or even the foreign trade, from the payment of tolls for passing through the canal. When the question was before this House in 1912, in the limited time given to its consideration, I came to the conclusion we did have the right. But it is a much involved question. While I have not yet assured myself of a change of mind on that suoject, let me remind Members here who seem so cocksure we are right and Great Britain wrong in her contentions that the best evidence of the difficulty of a right conclusion is to be found in the attitude of eminent American authorities on international law on both sides of the question.

International law is a growth of principles gathering force and effect from their acceptance by the civilized family of nations. Treaties are largely construed in consonance with an international public opinion founded on those principles. A sovereign State acknowledges no common superior, and it is obvious that there is no authority above a State or outside it which can coerce it to obey the provisions of international law. The international public opinion, supposedly impartial and just in its crystallization, therefore of necessity in most cases has controlling force.

It has been said by a learned American writer on international law:

International law is that body of rules and limitations which the sovereign States of the civilized world agree to observe in their intercourse and relation with each other. (Davis, George B., Elements of International Law.)

Speaking of international public opinion, Davis says:

This is one of the most potent, if not the most powerful, of the agencies now acting upon the development of international law.

Another widely known writer, in laying stress upon the very important part that the international public opinion must play in the accepted construction of a treaty, says international law—is founded on the tacit or implied consent of nations as deduced from their intercourse with each other; in order to determine whether any particular act is sanctioned or forbidden by this law, we must inquire whether it has been approved or disapproved by civilized nations generally, or at least by the particular nations which are affected in any way by the act. (Halleck's International Law, Vol. I, p. 55.)

The late Senator Cushman K. Davis, speaking of international law, in his work on that subject, said:

There must be a coercive force somewhere, because mankind obeys that law, nations obey it. In the first place there is the force of opinion. In the next place there is the force of pacific retaliation, or restrained intercourse, of international boycotting and outlawry, of unfriendly legislation.

If the civilized family of nations has decided the tolls question involved in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it evidently has, and the decision is against the United States, there being no vital issue affecting American political sovereignty or American honor, the fact of this decision has changed the entire situation from what it was at the time of the passage of the Panama Canal act, and is of sufficient importance, as affecting the standing of the United States in the family of nations, fully to justify the Representatives who voted for the original exemption to vote now for its repeal. They are not compromising their position. They are choosing an honorable course to meet conditions not foreseen when the original measure was put through this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no one really believes that the President would ask the Congress to take a step which involved the slightest sacrifice of national dignity. There is no danger that the American people will imagine that Woodrow Wilson is truckling to Great Britain or dragging the American flag to dishonor. The fact is that we have in the pending contest lost our sense of proportion in this House. Instead of a broad perspective which grows out of an appreciation of the currents of world thought and an international mental attitude, the conflict over repeal of the tolls-exemption clause has centered around a shadow, the specter of a lost political sovereignty in the Canal Zone.

A close examination of the diplomatic correspondence between Great Britain and America from the time of the first negotiations looking toward the Hay-Pauncefote treaty until the final act validating the treaty shows by the notes both of Great Britain's representatives and the representatives of the United States that the practical political sovereignty of the United States over the canal has been since the execution of the treaty a fact beyond doubt, and one amply recognized by Great Britain. If the repeal of the tolls exemption involved a concession to Great Britain which trenched in the slightest upon the qualified but ample sovereignty of America in the Canal Zone, I would not be for it, but it seems as clear as the blazing rays of the noonday sun that no such thought has been entertained by the statesmen and diplomats of either country.

We have, in fact, constantly confused the commercial relations established with Great Britain through the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with the possible loss of the recognition of our practical political sovereignty in the Canal Zone by that treaty. The negotiations looking to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which the United States felt fastened upon it obligations which it could never justifiably entertain in connection with the ownership of a canal across the Isthmus resulted in two Hay-Pauncefote treaties. The first treaty, after somewhat lengthy negotiations, was executed by Secretary of State John Hay and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador, but was amended by the United States Senate in a number of important particulars. As amended, Great Britain declined to ratify it.

In the first treaty clause 1 of article 2 provided:

The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise.

With the expression "in time of war as in time of peace" remaining in that clause, Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, when this treaty was before the Senate, presented an amendment designed to make clear the right of the United States, notwithstanding the rules for neutralization adopted by that treaty, to defend itself by its own forces, and to exercise, when at war, all of the rights of a belligerent over the canal which it was about to construct and own. When the first treaty was rejected and the second treaty completed, clause 1 of article 2 of the first treaty, which had become clause 1 of article 3 of the second treaty, did not contain the words "in time of war as in time of peace." They were removed at the instance of the representatives of the United States.

Those words were struck from the existing treaty that we might be sure that it would not be binding in time of war as well as in time of peace, for it is fundamental that treaties not made in contemplation of war terminate upon war arising between the parties to the treaty; but a treaty made in contemplation of war remains in force in war as in peace, and so the words "in time of war as in time of peace" were eliminated in order expressly to give the United States the right to defend the canal against any enemy.

With the elimination of the section just referred to, Secretary of State John Hay, in transmitting the second treaty to the Senate, stated that the language omitted left the United States in the position where—

War between the contracting parties or between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect upon treaties when not specially otherwise provided and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of defense, and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it and defend itself by whatever means might be necessary.

Article 2 of the final treaty recognizes that the United States "shall enjoy all the rights incident to the ownership of the canal," and expressly confers upon us "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

These undefined and unlimited powers of themselves constitute a practical political sovereignty.

It must also be observed that in order to assert the exclusive control of the canal by the United States and to get rid of any semblance of control by Great Britain or other powers, the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty omits entirely article 3 of the first treaty, which provided:

The high contracting parties will immediately upon the exchange of the ratification of this convention bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

This provision had been objected to by the Senate in discussing the first treaty. The United States, having limited Great Britain's rights under the treaty, objected to making any other nation a contractual party to it.

Moreover, in the first treaty you find article 2 saying:

The high contracting parties * * * adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules.

But the second treaty provides that—

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules.

The status of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is unquestionably fixed as a treaty limited to times of peace between the United States and Great Britain. There is, consequently, nothing in the contention that we surrender our independent control of the canal by the guaranty to maintain neutrality of the canal on any basis. That idea proceeds from a woeful misconception of what the word "neutralization" really means as between nations.

Dr. Oppenheim, in his great work on international law, says:

Neutrality may be defined as the attitude of impartiality toward belligerents, such attitude creating rights and duties between the impartial States and the belligerents.

And further on in the same chapter this writer says:

Neutrality is a condition during a condition of war only. Rights and duties deriving from neutrality do not exist before the outbreak of war.

There is, consequently, nothing in the rules relating to neutralization comprised in the treaty which, because of a concession of our lack of right in a time of peace to create a tolls exemption for our vessels, can be construed as a surrender of any element of our practical political sovereignty over the canal and Canal Zone, for the very simple reason that neutrality is a condition which we are to enforce when any two other nations are at war. It has nothing to do with the treatment of vessels of commerce or war during times of peace.

In this connection it must also be carefully noted that clause 7 of the first treaty expressly stated "no fortifications shall be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent." In the second treaty that stipulation is entirely eliminated. In a letter during the negotiations which led up to the second treaty Lord Lansdowne on August 3, 1901, said:

I understand that by the omission of all reference to the matter of defense the United States Government desires to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal, at any time when the United States may be at war, from destruction or damage at the hands of an enemy or enemies.

Having regard again for the character of the final Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a treaty applicable only to a peace status between this country and Great Britain, and carefully noting the express concession of the right to use such means to protect the canal as the United States sees fit, it may easily be understood why we have been able to fortify the canal without protest from Great Britain and announce it as a world policy that, as we have practical sovereignty in the Canal Zone, we shall treat the canal and the Canal Zone as our own in time of war.

Moreover, as we are charged with the sole duty to preserve the neutralization of the canal as between belligerents other than the United States, and as we are charged with the constant duty of its policing and its protection from lawlessness and disorder, it becomes preposterous to assert that as an incident to that practical, and admittedly practical, sovereignty necessary to accomplish these ends we may not pass our vessels of war, the vessels of war of the sovereign nation in practical control of the canal, to and fro through it at will without toll.

In the note of Sir Edward Grey of November 14, 1912, which has been so much discussed, and into which so much imaginative construction has been read, there is one clear and unequivocal declaration, which seems conclusive as between Great Britain and the United States of the practical sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone. It is this:

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

If the gentleman from New York, my friend [Mr. FITZGERALD] and others, who have builded an international controversy on the things which Sir Edward Grey may imaginatively be presumed to have said in his note, had examined with more care the Panama Canal act they would have found in a comparison of that act with the note the conclusive evidence that Great Britain continues to recognize the political control of the canal at the same time that she takes issue with us about what she claims is a commercial discrimination. In section 13 of that act there is found a paragraph which, in boldest language, indicates the full military control of the canal by the United States. That section is not objected to by Great Britain. It reads:

That in time of war in which the United States shall be engaged or when in the opinion of the President war is imminent, such officer of the Army as the President may designate shall assume authority over the canal and the Canal Zone.

Mr. Speaker, the plain truth is we have become excited over a flash in the pan. Great Britain concedes our political and military control of the canal and Canal Zone while demanding that we observe what she claims as a commercial stipulation in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. This position is sustained by the most eminent authority.

One of the foremost advocates of the right of the United States to do as it pleases under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty regarding the exemption of its own vessels from the payment of tolls is Hon. Chandler P. Anderson, formerly Counselor of the Department of State. In a paper read by him before the American Society of International Law in April, 1913, he makes this statement regarding the issue over the tolls:

That issue is not one which should arouse bad feeling or justify the charge of bad faith on either side, for it involves at most only the question of pecuniary damages, and does not present a situation under which the United States would gain any advantage by postponing its settlement until after the canal is opened.

That Mr. Taft when he was President did not think the issue of free-tolls exemption a serious one, or one involving the practical sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone, is indicated by the manner in which he referred to the question at the time he was advising the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives to find some method by which the matter might be determined. He stated:

Personally, as you know, I do not think that the exemption of ships engaged in the coastwise trade, which is limited to American ships, is a violation of the treaty, but I do think it of the highest importance that we should not take any step which may be construed to be a violation of our treaty obligations.

One of the leading English authorities opposing the contention of the United States, in a critical monograph on the subject, says:

Neither the independence nor the honor nor any vital interest of the parties can be said to be involved in the dispute.

And Sir Edward Grey, in the note previously referred to, closes the communication thus:

His Majesty's Government have confined their objections within the narrowest possible limits, and have recognized in the fullest manner the right of the United States to control the canal. They feel convinced that they may look with confidence to the Government of the United States to insure that, in promoting the interests of United States shipping, nothing will be done to impair the safeguards guaranteed to British shipping by treaty.

There need be no fear of loss of prestige or sacrifice of honor by the course we are about to pursue. That is always the cry of the jingo and the charlatan, but it should not deter the thoughtful man. In this House, without regard to what we may think is the true technical interpretation of the treaty as respects our right to exempt our own vessels of commerce from the payment of tolls, we are simply conceding equality of treatment to the vessels of Great Britain. We accept in a spirit of liberality the judgment of the world as regards the extent of a commercial concession we have made. We do it in our majesty, and with the consciousness that the claim for the square deal for that alleged concession is itself coupled with the full admission of the waving of the Stars and Stripes as the emblem of sovereignty over the canal. That man is bravest who in the hour of his triumph is generous. The American people will, I am satisfied, be willing in history to have recorded for them in this case a brave act of international generosity.

In 1842 the Webster-Ashburton treaty was concluded with England. It marked a remarkable development of the process of extradition of fugitives for any of seven offenses, and proved to be efficacious. Ten similar treaties were shortly afterwards concluded by Secretary of State Marcy during the administration of Franklin Pierce. At the time, the Webster-Ashburton treaty was loudly denounced as a mere trap for the recovery of political offenders. The other treaties encountered similar opposition. The United States was characterized as a Nation without the courage to protect our foreign-born citizens from the aggression of their mother countries. But, says a distinguished author on American diplomacy, "In no instance have these direful forebodings been justified by the event."

At the final period of the Crimean War, when Mr. Gladstone believed, with all his serene majesty as a Christian statesman of peace and progress, that the causes of England's participation in that war had ceased to exist and there was no justification for its continuance, he was denounced by the rabid English musketeer and the blatant jingo of a decadent English toryism as a truckler and a traitor. Yet an enlightened people soon recognized his manly independence and his determination that England as a nation should be governed by the principles of Christian ethics, and he was enshrined in the hearts of the English masses for all time.

With a broad international mind, not in the least inconsistent with sincere and devoted patriotism, the President, standing with patience and self-control at his post of high responsibility while a small current of blustering public opinion, stimulated by vainglorious greed and the valor of ignorance, is sweeping by, asks the American people to do the large thing.

From his fortunate position the President of the United States is able to speak upon international matters with an authoritative generosity which no other ruler can risk. The results of our Executive declarations in that concert which embraces all civilized countries are a convincing proof of the Nation's power, and also of the exercise of that highest influence which proceeds not from material force or bluster but from the constant adherence to those elevated policies that have identified American diplomacy with the cause of freedom and justice.

After the temporary loss of perspective shall have been regained in this House, and when the people shall in reflection have had time to recall the great address on Mars Hill, wherein St. Paul declared that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men," but also that "He hath determined the bounds of their habitation," we will cherish the sentiment of patriotism and at the same time the spirit of brotherhood toward the citizens of other nations. Then will the safety of the Nation's honor in the hands of the President be apparent, even to him who now doubts.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I am for this measure. [Applause.] I was for it in substance two years ago. There is nothing in the situation which causes me to change my views. I was for it two years ago, largely because of economic reasons. The same reasons persuade me to-day. I am not particularly concerned about the political aspect which has been sought to be thrown around this situation. Suffice it to say that I believe that we should get a revenue out of the canal and make it a paying concern. [Applause.]

The people of the United States will not be materially benefited by the exemption of tolls. Two and three cents per hundred pounds on articles consumed can not be distributed to the consuming masses. These savings will be held by either the manufacturer or they will be placed in the pockets of the shipowner. [Applause.]

The greatest corporations of the country—the Steel Trust, the Standard Oil, and the Meat Trust—have their own vessels. Is there anyone here who will claim that when they put their vessels through the canal and tolls are exempted that the people will get the benefit of such exemption? [Applause.] These tolls will go into the pockets of the owners of these corporations.

But there are other principles here. The exemption of tolls contravenes the terms of this treaty. If vessels from coast to coast in Mexico must pay tolls and our vessels do not have to pay tolls, there is inequality of treatment. If the vessels of Canada from coast to coast must pay tolls and our vessels do not pay tolls, there is inequality of treatment. If a vessel from British Columbia can take a cargo to New York and pays tolls, and a vessel from Seattle, only across the line, goes to the same port with a like cargo and is exempted from payment of tolls, there is inequality of treatment under the treaty. If a vessel starts from Liverpool with a cargo destined for San Francisco, it can take this cargo to New York and transship it to an American coastwise vessel, which can go through the canal free from tolls and reach San Francisco, whereas a vessel starting from Liverpool direct through the canal to San Francisco must pay tolls. That is inequality of treatment, as I view the treaty. If a vessel comes from an Asiatic port to San Francisco, it can transship its cargo to an American coastwise vessel and have it taken to New York through the canal free of tolls, but another vessel coming from Asiatic ports going direct through the canal to New York must pay tolls, and, again, that is inequality of treatment, as I view the treaty. For these reasons and for the fact that we are bound in honor to observe the treaty rightfully interpreted I am in favor of the pending measure. [Applause.]

INTERNATIONAL ASPECT.

While increasing difficulties in connection with the solution of our international problems, especially those relating to Japan and Mexico, doubtless had a large influence in inducing President Wilson to present his recent message to the two Houses urging immediate repeal of the provision in the Panama Canal act of 1912 exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, and while such complications and the necessity for their peaceful solution at the earliest possible date concerns us as Members of the House and concerns the Nation at large, I feel that the violation of the plain terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 made between the United States and Great Britain whereby in clause 1 of article 3 we solemnly stipulated and agreed—

> That the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable—is sufficient to persuade me to vote for the pending measure repealing exemption of tolls for our coastwise vessels. Believing that a nation is as firmly bound by its contracts made with other nations, as an individual is bound by his contract with another, the repeal of the exemption clause is absolutely necessary to restore our standing among the nations of the world, a standing which has been severely shaken by our action of two years ago, and the President, having fuller knowledge and being in closer touch with our international affairs, knowing that no partisan advantage could be obtained and, in fact, realizing that his party prestige might be shaken, nevertheless, as befits a President and with the courage of his convictions, has summoned the Nation to retrace its steps and rehabilitate itself in the minds of all right-thinking people. It would have been easier for him to have remained silent and avoided what may become a permanent breach in his party. So far from being criticized for having surrendered what some even of his own party have claimed to be our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty he should be given credit for sincerity of purpose and a desire to promote international justice.

Personally I am not concerned with the political aspect of this proposition. I opposed toll exemption for coastwise ships when our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce presented the Panama Canal act in May, 1912. I opposed it then largely because of economic reasons, and these reasons are just as persuasive now as they were then. I believe with Col. Goethals, the great constructor of the canal, and with Dr. Emory R. Johnson, the special commissioner on Panama Canal traffic and tolls, than whom there is no greater expert on this subject in the United States, that the canal should be made, so far as consistent with the charge of reasonable tolls on all traffic passing through it, self-sustaining, and that in view of the fact that the people of the United States, when the canal is finished, will have expended the enormous sum of $375,000,000, raised through the taxation of our people, they have given a sufficient benefaction to the world without being further taxed to maintain and operate it.

FIXED CHARGES.

According to the best estimates available, the cost of operation, maintenance, and repair per annum will be $3,500,000; cost of sanitation, $500,000; annuity to the Republic of Panama, under our treaty with the Republic, beginning July 1, 1913, $250,000; interest, at 3 per cent on cost of construction, $11,250,000; making a total of $15,500,000. If to this sum there be added, as recommended by Dr. Johnson and others, 1 per cent per annum of the cost of construction, for the purpose of developing an amortization fund for the gradual wiping out of the cost of construction, the further sum of $3,750,000, the total annual fixed charge would amount to $19,250,000.

REVENUES.

President Taft, in his order fixing the rate of tolls to be charged on the Isthmus, announced to the world that the rate per net register ton on all merchant vessels should be $1.20, and Dr. Johnson estimated that the greatest possible traffic that could be expected to use the canal during its first year of operation would be 10,500,000 tons, which amount of tonnage, at $1.20 per net register ton, would yield in the way of revenue $12,600,000, leaving an annual deficit therefore of $6,650,000. By 1924 it is estimated that the total net register tonnage passing through the canal will amount to 17,000,000 tons, which at $1.20 per ton would yield $20,400,000, or but little more than the total fixed charges as already specified, thus leaving nothing for the development of funds for the possible enlargement and improvement of the canal, as will doubtless be demanded by the increased size of ships and increased demands of commerce.

If, however, the coastwise traffic is exempted from tolls—and this traffic is estimated to amount to about a million net register tons during the first few years after the opening of the canal and is estimated will grow to 2,000,000 tons at the end of the first decade—there would have to be deducted over a million dollars a year from the receipts, and in the course of 10 years these deductions for coastwise traffic would amount to about $20,000,000, and the deficit for the first year or two with tolls on coastwise traffic exempted would amount to almost $8,000,000 per annum, which would have to be made up by the taxation of our people.

These calculations are on the assumption, however, that the rate of $1.20 per net register ton will be maintained during the first decade; but as we are to meet the competition of the Suez Canal, whose toll charges are now $1.21 per net register ton, practically the same as the Panama tolls, we will doubtless have to reduce the Panama tolls to a $1 basis in the near future. The Suez tolls have been lowered four times in the last decade, the last reduction having been made since the passage of the Panama Canal act in August, 1912. This reduction in the tolls at Panama to meet the Suez competition would not necessarily increase our revenues because of any increased traffic induced by such reduction. There would, therefore, be a still greater deficit per annum during the first decade than if the present rate were maintained. It becomes, therefore, a very practical question as to whether or not our Government, in the interests of our National Treasury and of our people, shall give to our coastwise vessels the benefit of toll exemption.

COASTWISE VESSELS.

Our coastwise vessels at present enjoy the most absolute monopoly of any interest in the United States. Under our navigation laws no foreign-built vessel or vessel owned abroad can participate in the coastwise trade. Freed from the competition of such vessels, our coastwise shipping has prospered and grown in size so that it is now, next to that of England, the largest in the world. Its tonnage during the last decade has increased 38 per cent, and the business has been profitable to the shipowners. It needs no further largess from the Government. Competition has been largely eliminated as a result of conference agreements as to rates and as to the ports supplied. But a small portion of our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific shipping is carried by independent lines. A large percentage is under the control of vessels owned by railroads.

Section 11 of the Panama Canal act forbids the use of the canal to vessels owned or controlled by railroads with which such vessels could be competitors. This provision would still further relieve coastwise traffic from the possible competition of railroad-owned vessels. There can be no justification, in view of the annual deficit resulting from the operation and maintenance of the canal, in relieving coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. On the contrary, in view of the advantages these vessels now enjoy under existing law and the profits they will be able to make by using the canal, they should be made to pay their proportionate share of the canal's maintenance and operation. To exempt them from tolls under such circumstances would be, in effect, to subsidize them. I am opposed to Government subsidy in any form, and have three times voted against giving subsidy to our American ships. If any vessels deserve subsidy at the hands of the Government, our vessels engaged in foreign trade, which have to meet the competition of vessels of other maritime nations which are more cheaply built and cheaply manned, ought to be given a subsidy. If there should be any discrimination as between the vessels belonging to citizens of the United States using the canal, the discrimination should be in favor of those engaged in foreign and not in the coastwise trade.

TOLL EXEMPTION MAY LESSEN AND NOT INCREASE TRAFFIC THROUGH THE CANAL.

The largest use of the canal by foreign nations will come as the result of the maintenance of friendly relations with them on the part of our Government. A construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which ignores its terms has not tended to conciliate England, the other signatory power thereto, and the maritime nations of the world. Feeling that the exemption of coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls is a violation of the treaty, they will not feel like increasing the revenues of the canal by persuading their maritime vessels to make use of it as against other competitive routes. It is said that trade follows the flag, implying that patriotism and love of country promote commerce. It is also true that trade will not always seek the shortest nor the cheapest route, but can be very materially affected by political considerations.

The colonists refused to trade with the mother country because they believed that they were unjustly dealt with and were being taxed without the right of representation. The people of China, after the Boxer rebellion, in which our country took a part, for a time boycotted trade with America and seriously reduced the amount of our shipments. Immediately after we remitted the Boxer indemnity confidence was restored, as well as our trade. The Underwood tariff bill has aroused much hostility in certain countries because of alleged discrimination. This hostility is manifesting itself in reduced exchanges of commodities between the United States and other countries. An interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which has exasperated the maritime nations of the world, will have a discouraging effect upon their use of it.

As the Panama Canal is to be the great competitor of the Suez Canal for the trade of various remote sections of the world, we will handicap our canal and thus promote traffic through the Suez Canal which should naturally and under the force of economic conditions pass through the Panama Canal. The competitive zones will be New Zealand, Australia, Japan, and the northern portion of the Chinese coast.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

New York, via the Panama Canal, is nearer Sydney, on the east coast of Australia, than by way of the Cape of Good Hope by 4,000 miles. This would represent a saving of 16 days for a 10-knot ship. If we take the formula that the cost of a 10-knot ship at sea is 10 cents per net register ton per day, with a ship of 4,000 net register tons, the lowest which can profitably use the canal, these 16 days of time saved by the use of the Panama Canal, reduced to dollars, would represent $6,400. The canal tolls at $1.20 per net register ton on such a vessel would amount to $4,800, leaving a net advantage to the vessel using this canal of $1,600. Will this small financial advantage induce a British vessel returning from Sydney to sail westward to New York via Cape of Good Hope, where no tolls will have to be paid, or eastward across the Pacific through the Panama Canal? When we consider that a large share of our commerce with Australia is carried in British and other foreign ships, and the further fact that Sydney, and, in fact, all Australia, is a British possession, and the further fact that British influence dominates its banking, shipping, and commercial affairs, will it be unreasonable to expect that such vessels would prefer the Cape of Good Hope route, Great Britain and other European nations believing themselves to be discriminated against by reason of our exemption of coastwise traffic?

Take another illustration: New York via Panama is 2,500 miles nearer Wellington, the leading port of New Zealand, than via the Straits of Magellan. This would represent a saving to a 10-knot ship of 4,000 net register tons of 10 days, and be equivalent to $4,000. The Panama Canal tolls would amount to $4,800, which would represent a saving of $800 in favor of the route through the Straits of Magellan. As New Zealand is another British possession, whose commerce, banking, and shipping interests are under British influence, it would not be unreasonable to expect that such vessel would use the Straits of Magellan, notwithstanding the extra hazards of such route, as against the Panama Canal route.

Liverpool is equidistant from Sydney, Australia, via the Panama and the Suez routes. Which route would a British vessel prefer in plying between these ports? In view of the fact that the British Government owns 176,000 shares of the Suez Canal Co., a little less than a majority of the stock, and the canal tolls paid at Suez pay a handsome dividend on the stock held by the British Government, the Suez route would undoubtedly be preferred.

New York is equidistant from Hongkong, China, via the Panama and Suez routes. Hongkong is the British port of China. Would not the same influences which would operate to divert traffic between Liverpool and Sydney to the Suez route divert the traffic between New York and Hongkong to the same route?

Liverpool is nearer Yokohama via Suez than via Panama by 700 miles, representing a saving of time via Suez of 2.4 days to a 10-knot ship. Could the Panama Canal expect to secure its proper share of this traffic largely carried on in British and European bottoms under political conditions existing as a result of the exemption of our coastwise traffic? Would not the existing strained relations between us and Japan, resulting from our agitation against Japanese immigration and the recent hostile demonstrations in California against Japanese in connection with tenure of land, promote patronage of the Suez Canal at the expense of the Panama Canal?

Valparaiso, the chief port of Chile, and the entire west coast of South America is nearer Liverpool via Panama than via the Straits of Magellan by 1,540 miles, representing a saving of 5.9 days for a 10-knot ship. This would represent a saving of nearly $2,400; but as the canal tolls would amount to $4,800 on a ship of 4,000 net register tons, there would be a financial disadvantage of $2,400 against the Panama route. Could we hope to retain our rightful share of the commerce of Valparaiso through the Panama Canal under the existing irritation resulting from our interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Would not vessels plying in this trade, owned by British syndicates closely allied with the British Government, feel justified under the law of retaliation in ignoring the Panama route and following the beaten path through the Straits of Magellan?

If it is conceded, as I think it must be, that political considerations arising out of what the nations of the world consider to be an unjust interpretation of the treaty of 1901 can have a material effect in controlling trade routes, then our persistence in such an unjust interpretation will inevitably result in reduction of its revenues. Such reductions will still further increase the deficit to which I have already called attention, and hence increase the taxation of our people. As but 9 per cent of the foreign commerce of the United States, including exports and imports, is carried in American bottoms, we must be dependent upon foreign bottoms for the carriage of the balance of such trade, and to that extent we must be more or less at the mercy of the foreign shipowners, who determine almost exclusively their own routes of travel. If such consequences are not imaginary, but real, it would be an act of wisdom on our part to vote for the pending bill and thus remove existing friction, irritation, and misunderstanding. If we would permit our canal to enjoy the largest usefulness of which it is capable, we ought to restore harmonious trade relations with the mercantile nations of the world.

WHAT WOULD BE THE RATES CHARGED BY OUR COASTWISE SHIPS?

No one can foretell the rates which will be charged by our vessels passing through the canal engaged in the coast-to-coast traffic. One thing is clear, and that is that these rates, as most ocean rates have been heretofore, will be fixed by what the traffic will bear. This was the same principle which controlled the fixing of railroad rates prior to the enactment of the Hepburn Act, supplemented by the Mann-Elkins Act, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to regulate rates and to declare what is a reasonable and just rate.

The testimony before our committee and the testimony recently taken by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries clearly demonstrates that coastwise as well as high-sea shipping and the rates charged are determined by pools or conference agreements, and that but a small portion of the traffic is in the hands of independent carriers. In the recent report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries as to coastwise trade generally, the following statement was made:

Considering all the line services engaged in the coastwise and Great Lakes trade, the following totals appear: The lines number 60, the steamers operated strictly in the domestic trade 474, and the gross tonnage of these steamers is 1,180,897 tons. Of these totals, 19 railroads control 209 steamers, 44 per cent of the total, and 589,561 gross tons, nearly 50 per cent of the total. Eleven lines belong to shipping consolidations and operate 121 steamers, 25.5 per cent of the total, with 279,180 gross tons, 23.6 per cent of the total. All told, the 30 lines referred to as controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations operate 330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons, or nearly 70 per cent of the total number of steamers and 74 per cent of the tonnage.

Under such control monopolistic conditions as to rates, as to routes, and as to ports of call, must inevitably result, and unless controlled by placing our coastwise shipping—so far, at least, as line vessels are concerned—under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or similar governing body, the rates charged will be what the traffic will bear and not what the service is worth.

If the rates through the canal were controlled by what the service is worth, we might expect a very material reduction in the present rates from coast to coast, passing over the Panama Railroad and the Tehuantepec route. These rates now average from $12 to $15 per cargo ton. The present charge from hull to hull at Panama is $3 per cargo ton and at Tehuantepec one-third of the through rate, amounting to about $3.50 per cargo ton. These rates would amount to $6 per net register ton at Panama and about $7 per net register ton at Tehuantepec. Reductions by these amounts we would have a right to expect upon the opening of the Panama Canal.

The rate which our coast-to-coast vessels passing through the canal will charge will be based in some measure on the average cost of haul east and west bound. As the present traffic over the Panama and Tehuantepec routes from our Pacific coast to our Atlantic and Gulf seaports is from one-fourth to one-third of the traffic from the Atlantic and Gulf seaports to the Pacific coast, vessels eastbound would have smaller cargoes, and as the operating cost would be almost the same, less revenue would be derived by line vessels making the eastbound trip, hence the vessel owner would raise the rates so as to equalize the cost of operation both ways.

Even though the rates on coast-to-coast traffic may not be based on cost of service, and they will not be under existing practice, nevertheless the reductions which the canal will render possible will result in a material reduction in transcontinental rail rates; and this reduction may be so great as to render it unprofitable for transcontinental railroads to continue to compete for much of the traffic which now passes from coast to coast by rail. As section 11 of the Panama Canal act practically forbids the use of the canal to vessels owned by railroads competing with themselves, the rail carriers will lose a considerable part of the 3,000,000 tons of transcontinental freight now annually hauled by them. According to some experts, this loss may reach 10 per cent. The larger portion of this traffic they will retain, but the bulk freight and freight which can go in cargo lots, which is nonperishable, and where time of delivery is not material, will go by vessel through the canal, but more expensive freight, where speed and certainty of time of delivery are essential, will continue to go by rail. This has been the experience in all countries where rail and water routes competed for business.

THE MIDDLE WEST AND CANAL TOLLS.

The region of the upper lakes and Mississippi Valley will secure little direct benefit from the Panama Canal. Some traffic may be developed on the Mississippi River between St. Paul and the Gulf, but little upstream commerce can be expected under existing methods of river transportation. The products of this great region must be shipped eastward via the Great Lakes or by rail across a mountain range, a distance of almost 1,000 miles, to reach the nearest Atlantic ports, or the products must be transported down the Mississippi or by way of railroads running southward to the Gulf ports, a distance of a thousand miles, or products must be shipped by rail westward over two mountain ranges for a distance of from 1,500 to 2,000 miles. Handicapped by such distances from ocean ports the upper lakes and Mississippi region, to get its products to the coast to enter the world's commerce or to get the products of the world's commerce brought to it, must pay heavy transportation charges. These charges will not be affected as much as is generally expected as a result of the competition afforded by the Panama Canal, for unless the coastwise vessels absorb the rail rate from interior points to the coast and from the coast to the interior the Middle West will have to rely largely upon the railroads for its inbound and outbound traffic.

THE LONG AND SHORT HAUL CLAUSE.

Coast-to-coast traffic by rail for the last decade, and even longer, has moved under what are known as blanket rates—that is to say, the same rate for the same commodity from any point in a given zone or territory to a coast terminal, irrespective of distance. From the region extending from the Missouri River eastward to the Atlantic coast the same rates, class and commodity, with some exceptions, are made over the transcontinental lines to their Pacific terminals at Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, and so forth—that is to say, the freight rate on common window glass, for instance, in carload lots destined for these Pacific coast terminals would be 90 cents per hundred pounds, whether shipped from New York, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Kansas City, or even Denver.

The effect of such blanket rates is to give the Middle West an opportunity of competing with the Atlantic seaboard for the trade along the Pacific coast and the intermountain country. At present 75 per cent of the traffic with the Pacific coast and intermountain points originates west of Buffalo and Pittsburgh, and at least 50 per cent originates in the region about Chicago. Will the industries, both manufacturing and agricultural, of the Middle West be able to maintain their present share in Pacific coast commerce after the canal is in operation and water competition ensues? It is claimed that the Panama Canal will render it possible to reduce the cost of shipping goods from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboard to one-third of what the transcontinental rail rates now are, and that in consequence of such competition the railroads will find it unprofitable to compete for such business and will surrender the same to the water carriers. Then, even though the present system of blanket rates be permitted to continue, these industries may be put to a disadvantage and the traffic materially reduced.

The impairment of the commerce of the Middle West with Pacific ports would be still more encroached upon and diminished by exemption of tolls, even though such exemption would represent but 2 or 3 cents per hundred pounds. Whether or not the system of blanket rates under which our Middle West has been able to develop a large commerce along the Pacific coast and in the Mountain States will be permitted to continue will depend in a large measure upon the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the so-called Spokane and Reno cases, now pending before it. These cases interpret section 4, the so-called long and short haul clause, of the interstate-commerce acts as amended by the act of June 18, 1910. This section is as follows:

SEC. 4 (as amended June 18, 1910). That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, or to charge any greater compensation as a through route than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the Interstate Commerce Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the commission to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section: Provided further, That no rates or charges lawfully existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act shall be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section prior to the expiration of six months after the passage of this act, nor in any case where application shall have been filed before the commission in accordance with the provisions of this section until a determination of such application by the commission.

Whenever a carrier by railroad shall in competition with a water route or routes reduce the rates on the carriage of any species of freight to or from competitive points it shall not be permitted to increase such rates unless after hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission it shall be found that such proposed increase rests upon changed conditions other than the elimination of water competition.

Section 4 in the original interstate-commerce act of 1887 made it unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, and placed the burden of proof upon the shipper. Under decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the use of the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" practically rendered section 4 nugatory, and it remained a dead letter until it was amended by the act approved June 18, 1910.

In the Spokane and Reno cases, decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission and still under advisement on appeal before the Supreme Court of the United States, the defendant carriers contended that water competition justified a lesser rate for the longer haul to the coast terminals than for a shorter haul to intermediate points. The commission, after an elaborate investigation and full hearings, found that there was active water competition as to coast-to-coast traffic; that this traffic, since the entrance into the field of the Hawaiian-American Line and other lines, had largely increased, and that the lower rates rendered possible by the opening of the Panama Canal would still further increase the competition and the traffic by water, and hence the transcontinental railroad lines were entitled to make certain discriminations against intermediate or intermountain points; and therefore the rates charged from points east of the Missouri River to coast terminals could be less than those charged to intermediate points, although the distances were less, but held that the system of blanket rates was unreasonable and untenable from an economic standpoint, and ordered that the territory east of the Missouri River to the Atlantic seaboard, from which rates to the Pacific terminals had been blanketed, should be subdivided into zones, each zone from west to east carrying an increasing differential; that is to say, the rates from all points in zone 1, which embraced the territory west of the Missouri to the Pacific coast, should be the same for intermediate as for Pacific coast terminal points. The rates from zone 2, embracing roughly the Mississippi Valley and typified by the cities of St. Paul, Chicago, and St. Louis, to intermediate or intermountain points should not exceed 7 per cent of the rates to the Pacific coast terminals; that from zone 3, which would be typified by the cities of Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Cincinnati, the rates to intermediate or intermountain points should not exceed by 15 per cent the rates to the Pacific coast terminals; that from zone 4, which roughly represents the territory east of the Alleghenies, including New England, the rates to intermediate or intermountain points should not exceed by more than 25 per cent the rates to the Pacific coast terminals.

This new system, if confirmed by the Supreme Court, will radically change the method of rate making from coast to coast, and may lead to the adoption in the United States of distance tariffs. The blanket rate under which traffic was carried irrespective of distance enabled the Middle West to secure the same rates on transcontinental traffic as were granted the Atlantic seaboard and the Pittsburgh district, and resulted in the building up of the large manufacturing industries in the valleys of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers. Will the industries of these regions embracing the Middle West be able to retain their present supremacy along the Pacific coast, and especially in the intermountain region, when allowed a freight rate to intermountain points only 7 per cent in excess of the rates to the Pacific seaboard, in competition with industries of the Atlantic seaboard, where 25 per cent increase is allowed? In other words, will the 25 per cent increase by rail neutralize the advantage which the Atlantic seaboard has by water, and will the system of differentials recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commision in the Spokane and Reno cases be applicable when the Panama Canal is open for traffic, or will there have to be not only a radical change in transcontinental rates but also of these differentials?

In my opinion, the railroads, if they would retain their coast-to-coast traffic, must materially reduce their rates. If they decide to surrender what may amount to 10 per cent of their present transcontinental traffic, they will be permitted by the commision to maintain the rates to intermediate points, based on the zone system, as I have already set forth. If, however, they seek to meet the competition of the ships engaged in coast-to-coast traffic and reduce the rates to the coast terminals, under the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Spokane and Reno cases there would have to be material reductions of rates to intermediate points, resulting in a loss of revenue, and the road having the larger number of intermediate points with densest population and greatest industrial and agricultural development along its right of way would suffer more in loss of revenue than a transcontinental road which passed through a thinly populated region and depended for most of its revenue on its through business.

ABSORPTION OF RATES.

The competition between coastwise ships and transcontinental rail lines will not be confined to the coast terminals, but in order to secure traffic and extend their influence into the interior these ships will follow the present practice of the ships of the Panama Railroad Co. and absorb the rail rates from points in the interior as far west as Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Cincinnati to the Atlantic port. On the Pacific side the rail rate into the interior as far east as Spokane, Salt Lake City, Reno, and other points may be absorbed and these ships still be able to meet the transcontinental rate by rail, thus still further affecting the volume of rail traffic and encroaching upon the trade territory of the Middle West, especially in the intermountain region. If tolls of $1.20 per net register ton be exempted, it would intensify these tendencies I have just mentioned that much more. As lumber is now being carried under commodity rates from Seattle and other Sound cities to the western boundary line of Minnesota, half way across the continent, at 40 cents per hundred, a charge of 2 or 3 cents per hundred, which represents the toll charge of $1.20 per net register ton, would materially affect the distance which such commodity could be hauled, depending upon whether tolls were exempted or charged.

I do not believe that our Government has any right to so regulate toll charges on the Isthmus of Panama as to seriously discriminate against one section of our country in favor of another; that as all our people are to be taxed to pay for the construction of the canal and to pay for the annual deficits arising from its operation and maintenance, all our people, so far as possible, should be permitted to enjoy whatever advantages the canal will render possible. In other words, the benefits should be equalized among all our people. In view of the fact that our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts will enjoy large advantages in increased business, not only from coast to coast but business with foreign nations, and will enjoy reductions in the cost of living which lower rates will make possible, there can be no justification for these sections demanding still further advantages in the way of toll exemption, as by such exemption the interior section, or Middle West, is not only not benefited but discriminated against.

I have heard it stated on this floor that if tolls on coastwise ships were not exempted the railroads would increase their transcontinental rates by the amount of the tolls. This statement has no foundation in fact. If, as all concede, the rates through the canal from coast to coast, even with tolls paid, would be at least from six to seven dollars per ton less than the transcontinental rail rates, and by some estimated to be but one-third of such rates, it would be absurd on the part of the rail carriers, in the face of tremendous competition, to increase their own rates. They know that they will have to reduce their rates. Moreover, it seems to have been forgotten that the rail carriers, since the interstate-commerce act was amended in 1910, can not increase their rates without such increase first having been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is there anyone who believes that these carriers, if tolls were not exempted at the Isthmus, would be allowed by the commission, even if they sought to do so unthinkable a thing, to increase their rates and justify such increase because of such canal tolls?

In this connection I wish to make a further suggestion which has pertinency in this discussion, and that is that irrespective of the tolls charged on coast-to-coast traffic the rail carriers of the United States, under the decisions in the Supreme Court, will be entitled to a fair return on the fair valuation of their property. With a physical valuation now in progress, the Interstate Commerce Commission will have the data necessary to determine the proper standards for rate making and the carriers will be permitted to ask and collect such freight charges as in the opinion of the commission will permit them to earn a fair return. No matter what competition the canal creates, no matter how much business is taken from the rail carriers and transferred to the water carriers, the railroads will be permitted, under the commission, to so fix or readjust their rates as to permit them to live. I hold no brief for the railroads. I have taken an humble part in securing the enactment of legislation providing for their regulation by the Government. I am confident that under such regulation they will continue to be great instrumentalities in the industrial development of our country. Exact justice ought to be dealt out to them, and this will be done whether tolls on coastwise traffic are exempt or not.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

Under the system of blanket rates which the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made in the Spokane and Reno cases, sought to change the rate per hundred pounds on less than carload lots of boots and shoes from all points in the territory lying between the Missouri River and the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast terminals is $2.75. The rate via the Panama Railroad is $1.65, giving an advantage to the latter route of $1.10 per hundred. The New England manufacturer of boots and shoes would thus have an advantage of $1.10 per hundred over the manufacturer at St. Louis, Milwaukee, and other points in the Mississippi Valley in securing and holding trade along the Pacific coast, and with this advantage would be able to ship goods inland from the Pacific coast terminals into the intermountain region for such a distance by rail as the $1.10 would pay for. As the Panama Canal will make it possible for coastwise ships to charge considerably less than the $1.65 now charged over the Panama Railroad, then, if the transcontinental rail rate is maintained, the advantage to the Atlantic coast manufacturer would be still greater, and his goods could be shipped still farther eastward into the interior from the Pacific coast terminal. It is to be expected, however, that the transcontinental rail rate will have to be materially reduced if the rail carriers wish to retain their present share of the coast to coast traffic or their share of the intermountain traffic. The exemption of tolls will permit the water carriers to push the frontier line of competition still farther eastward and thus to that extent shrink the territory to which our Middle West manufacturers and producers believe themselves to be entitled. While it is true that the rail carriers would get the benefit of the short haul from the Pacific coast terminals to intermediate points, this traffic would not compensate them for the loss sustained by failure to secure the revenue from the longer haul westbound by rail from the Middle West.

If the Supreme Court sustains the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Spokane and Reno cases, establishing the zone system with differentials, with distance tariffs ultimately in view, the same results will, in my opinion, follow. In the Spokane case the commission, in its order, recommended a $2 rate per hundred in less-than-carload lots of boots and shoes from all points in zone 1, which includes all territory west of the Missouri River to the Pacific coast, to Pacific coast terminals, allowing no discrimination against intermediate points. From zone 2, the Mississippi River section, the rate of about $2.18 was recommended to intermediate points and from zone 4, representing the Atlantic seaboard, with a differential of 25 per cent, a rate of about $2.50 was recommended. The St. Louis manufacturer, under these rates, would thus pay about 32 cents less per hundred in less-than-carload lots to intermediate or intermountain points than his Massachusetts competitor, but the latter has an alternative route via the Panama Canal; and even with the present rate of $1.65 via the Panama Railroad the Massachusetts manufacturer would have an advantage of 53 cents for the trade along the Pacific coast. The reductions which will follow the opening of the Panama Canal would still further increase his advantage, unless the commission authorized a lower rate than $2, as recommended under conditions existing at the time of making this decision in June, 1911. The exemption of tolls, amounting in the case of shoes to about 3 cents per hundred, would by so much increase the advantage of the eastern manufacturer in encroaching upon the territory of the manufacturer of the Middle West.

CONSUMER NOT BENEFITED.

While I have attempted to show that the exemption of tolls would have some effect in shifting the line of competition eastward, and thus lessen the territorial limits of the manufacturers and producers of the Middle West, thus giving an advantage to the manufacturers and producers of the coasts, or will enable the owners of coastwise ships to absorb the tolls exempted, little or no benefit will inure to the consumers of the country and such toll exemption will not manifest itself in a reduction of the cost of living, especially throughout the Middle West. The amount of tolls fixed at $1.20 per net register ton, equivalent to from 40 to 60 cents per cargo ton, can not be extended over ordinary units of purchase so as to reach the consumer. This can best be shown by several illustrations:

A box of California oranges weighs 90 pounds and contains about 10 dozen of standard size. In a long ton there will be 25 boxes. The toll on 25 boxes will be $0.60, or $0.0204 on each box. The toll on a dozen of these oranges would amount to $0.002, a sum so infinitesimal that the consumer can not get it.

A keg of nails weighs about 100 pounds. A long ton would, therefore, contain 22 kegs. At $0.60 per ton, the toll on each keg would amount to $0.0273. A consumer buying by the pound would be unable to get any advantage from toll exemptions.

A barrel of flour weighs 196 pounds, or 11 barrels to the ton. The tolls would represent $0.054 per barrel. Flour is not purchased by the average consumer by the barrel, but by the sack. As there are four sacks to the barrel, the amount of tolls per sack would be represented by $0.013. With flour selling at $1.45 per sack, the consumer would not be benefited.

A box of shoes containing 36 pairs weighs about 50 pounds. There are approximately 45 boxes to the ton. The tolls on a box would amount to $0.0133, or one thirty-sixth of this amount on a pair.

A case of canned salmon containing forty-eight 1-pound cans weighs about 70 pounds. There are about 38 cases to the ton. The tolls on each case would amount to $0.015. The consumer's share, if he could secure it, would be one forty-eighth of this amount per can.

These illustrations could be multiplied, but it would only demonstrate what I have already stated, that the exemption would not inure to the benefit of the consumer. Even the retailer and the wholesaler would not be benefited. Some jobbers and others whose business was of sufficient size to enable them to handle cargo lots would be able to get some advantage, but under the present system of fixing ocean freight rates by conference agreements and on the principle of charging what the traffic will bear the owners of coastwise ships will be the largest beneficiaries, and these least require and least deserve the profits resulting from toll exemption. Protected as no other interest is protected under the laws of the United States, enjoying a monopoly which no foreign-built or foreign-owned vessels can interfere with, given vastly increased opportunities for larger business and greater profits as a result of the construction of the canal, it would be an act of injustice to our people to tax themselves to build and to maintain and operate the canal in order to subsidize these coastwise ships through an exemption of tolls.

RETALIATION.

Under the treaty of Washington, entered into between the United States and Great Britain and Canada in 1871, vessels of the United States and Canada are allowed to use on terms of equality the waters of the Great Lakes, the Soo Canal, the Welland Canal, and the St. Lawrence River.

Under this treaty American vessels used the Canadian lock at the Soo last year to the extent of 39,000,000 tons, an amount larger than that passing through the American locks, and used the Welland Canal, wholly within Canadian territory, to the extent of a million tons. Early in the nineties Canada sought to discriminate against our vessels using the Welland Canal and the canals of the St. Lawrence, making the same contention that those who favor free tolls for our coastwise ships are now making in the pending controversy. President Harrison sent a special message to Congress protesting against this discrimination against our American vessels using the waterways of Canada and urged retaliatory legislation. Such legislation was passed and remains on the statute books, but Canada withdrew her restrictions on American vessels, thereby conceding our contention of equality of treatment under the treaty of Washington. In view of this controversy and the position we took in connection therewith, we can not and ought not now to assume a position as to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which contains an even stronger provision as to equality of all vessels, inconsistent with the position we then took. The maintenance of our interpretation of the treaty of Washington is absolutely necessary to the welfare of the great Northwest—to its agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests. When it is remembered that the traffic through the Soo Canal last year was over three times the traffic passing through the Suez Canal and six times the amount of the traffic of all kinds that will use the Panama Canal for the first few years of its operation, we ought not, in our interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, assume an attitude which may jeopardize this tremendous traffic between the Northwest and the Atlantic seaboard.

The Canadian Government has projected and started the construction of the Georgian Bay Canal connecting Georgian Bay by way of the French and Ottawa Rivers with Ottawa, and Montreal on the St. Lawrence. This new waterway will be wholly within Canadian territory and will save several hundred miles of travel down Lake Huron, through the St. Clair River, through Lake Erie, the Welland Canal, Lake Ontario, and the upper St. Lawrence. This canal is not within the purview of the treaty of Washington. Its use by American vessels will, therefore, have to be subject to the terms of a new treaty to be negotiated between the United States and Great Britain and Canada. If we insist upon our exemption of coastwise vessels at Panama and thus discriminate against the vessels of these countries in violation of what they consider to be the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, what is to prevent them from exempting their own vessels using the Georgian Bay Canal and charging toll to our American vessels? Would not such discrimination seriously militate against the commerce at the head of the Lakes and throughout the Northwest, extending as far westward as Montana? Should we jeopardize this mighty commerce for the purpose of granting toll exemption to only about a million tons of coast-to-coast traffic passing through the Panama Canal? Lex talionis, the law of retaliation, is just as operative among nations as it is among individuals. In my opinion the farmers and producers of the Middle West are called upon to pay too big a price for such toll exemption, and in the interest of our people and their commerce I protest against such exemption.

SUBSIDIES.

It has been repeatedly stated in this debate that if the exemption from tolls of our coastwise vessels is a subsidy then the free use granted to our vessels in the improvement of rivers and harbors within the limits of the United States is likewise a subsidy. This is not a logical deduction. Why were Members during the consideration of the rivers and harbors bill last week so earnest in securing appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors in their respective districts?

It was because they believed such improvement would increase the commerce of the cities in their districts; would result in increase of population, business, prosperity, and wealth; would inure to the benefit of the Government by making available larger sources of revenue and taxation, and thus develop funds out of which still larger river and harbor improvements could be made. But like results would not follow, even though the Panama Canal increased the population of the cities of Colon and Panama to 100,000 or 150,000 each. Such increases, with all that they imply, would inure almost wholly to the increase in the wealth and prosperity of a foreign country—the Republic of Panama. Their increase in wealth and prosperity and possibilities of revenue and taxation would fatten the treasury of that Republic and not ours. By the river and harbor act of 1884 we made the use of our rivers and harbors free to the vessels of all other nations which granted like freedom to our vessels in their rivers and harbors, believing that such reciprocal arrangement would be to our advantage, to the increase of our commerce, and the upbuilding of our population, wealth, and prosperity.

Notwithstanding the breaking of bulk at Panama since our occupation and ownership of the Panama Railroad, commerce over this road between our coasts is considered as coastwise traffic. If the contention of those who oppose the repeal of the exemption clause in the Panama Canal act is sound, they would have a right, under their construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to demand exemption of the present charge of $3.50 per long ton as freight charges over the Panama Railroad, this road being owned and operated by the United States, and yet during the 10 years of our ownership and operation of this road for commercial purposes no one has contended that such exemption should be made. Why should the contention for toll exemption now be made? Is it because the cost of putting freight through the canal will be but 50 cents per long ton as against $3.50? Can a mere reduction, material though it be, be a justification for such a demand? Would not a demand for the exemption of the greater rate be more logical, granting that the right of exemption under the treaty exists? What right, even without a treaty, has the owner of a coastwise vessel of 10,000 net register tons to pass his vessel through the canal free, notwithstanding an actual cost to the Government for operation, supervision, wear and tear of $5,000, when the owner of an American vessel engaged in foreign trade, having a like tonnage and like cargo, is charged $12,000? In view of the needs of the Federal Treasury, the high fixed charges, and the oppressive competition of foreign ships, there can be no justification for such discrimination, and when the plain terms of the treaty are considered there is still less justification.

SURRENDER OF SOVEREIGNTY.

To arouse opposition to the pending measure, to persuade the timid and furnish excuse for violating the treaty, the false cry is raised here and elsewhere that the passage of this bill would be a surrender to Great Britain. I am not at all persuaded that there is any force in such a charge. To exact tolls from our coastwise ships in obedience to the terms of the treaty can not be construed as a surrender of sovereignty to Great Britain or any other foreign power. To do right and observe the terms of our contract is not an act of truckling, but an act which reflects credit on the United States. England and Canada did not surrender sovereignty when they granted equal treatment to the vessels of the United States in the use of the Canadian Soo and Welland Canals, both wholly within Canadian territory. Germany, France, and England do not surrender their sovereignty when they grant to the vessels of the United States the equal use of their respective rivers and harbors, and for the same reason the United States does not surrender any of its sovereignty to the vessels of these powers because of a grant to them of the equal use of our own rivers and harbors. The United States, with its hundred millions of people, its enormous wealth and financial power, is too big to be successfully charged with truckling or surrender. Our very greatness ought to be the strongest reason why we should deal not merely justly with foreign nations under our treaties but even generously, and I hope the time will never come when the United States will be too big to be just and honorable.

Hon. William E. Chandler, former Secretary of the Navy and for many years a distinguished Senator from the State of New Hampshire, a few days ago made this significant statement:

> Is this a time for deliberately breaking a compact with England which has existed for 70 years and has culminated in its latest expression in 1900 by her surrender of her right to participate in unmistakable terms by the United States to build and maintain it upon the principle of perfect equality for all the nations of the earth?
> If we do thus break our sacred obligation, we shall pay a fearful price. We shall establish the dangerous and degrading proposition that the United States will never make a treaty that it will not instantly break whenever self-interest or popular clamor demands that the outrage be committed. The United States will continue in existence only as a dishonored nation, whose solemn word to another nation can never be trusted, and which will, therefore, be absolutely wholly without influence outside its own borders. What will then become of the Monroe doctrine?

If the United States is to maintain its position among the nations of the world and its prestige in international affairs and secure the recognition of England and the nations of Europe in the supremacy on the Western Hemisphere of the Monroe doctrine, it must observe with scrupulous exactness every letter and line of its treaty obligations. The gain of some small pecuniary advantage resulting from toll exemption for coastwise ships can never make good the losses of infinitely greater pith and moment connected with our relations with the nations of the world.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman yield back any time?

The SPEAKER. Half a minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is some. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WEAVER] five minutes.

[Mr. WEAVER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Oregon completed his use of time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER].

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, if the position of the Democratic administration on the question of free tolls for American coastwise ships through the canal be correct, then, sir, John Hay was a monumental blunderer. If John Hay was a great statesman and an able lawyer, then some one else is a monumental blunderer, and the men who are supporting this bill are making a serious error.

In this morning's Herald I read the statement that the President of the United States had found another reason why we should repeal free tolls. We have been hearing from day to day of this will-o'-the-wisp thing—this mysterious, indefinite something advanced as a reason why we should repeal the free-tolls clause. But this morning the Herald comes out with the statement that the President of the United States admits fear of subsidy and tolls exemption. I wonder how long since the Democrats of the House began to fear a subsidy for the Shipping Trust. Was is not but a few months ago, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the United States, together with a majority of the Democratic Party, supported a clause in the Underwood tariff bill providing for a 5 per cent rebate of duty on all goods brought into the United States in American bottoms? And has he just now decided that this is a subsidy to shipping interests of the United States? What of the possibilities of the Canadian Pacific Railway and its ships? Can not these ships take on a cargo at Halifax, pay tolls through the canal, and go on to the western market, while that privilege does not obtain to American railway ships, and will this feature not cause some degree of embarrassment to the administration in the future? Subsidize no ships in connection with canal regulations, but do not deliberately throttle American shipping and advance Great Britain's interests.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the men who voted $10,000,000 the other day for appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors on the Mississippi would charge tolls to American shippers for the use of these improved waterways. Two million dollars have been expended to improve and deepen the river between Minneapolis and St. Paul. For what purpose, I ask these gentlemen from Minnesota? For the purpose of giving deep-water transportation from Minneapolis to the Gulf of Mexico. Does it not appear it might be wise to have the millers of Minnesota put their flour upon a boat and let it float down the Mississippi, transfer it at New Orleans, and have it delivered in Pacific coast cities—an all-water route?

A matter of honor is advanced. There seems to be an honest difference of opinion as regards the question of honor in this free-tolls debate; but in the final analysis have we not the right to arbitrate this question? The weakness of the position of the administration on this question is the laugh of Great Britain and the shame of the United States. Every foreign nation wonders at our stupidity, and will continue to wonder at it should we pass this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four and one-half minutes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, we see to-day before us in this Chamber the magnificent portrait of the Father of his Country to the right of our Speaker and the stately form of Lafayette, hero of two worlds, on his left, and by that we are reminded of the travail and labor of the natal day of this Republic. The sacred luster that beams from those two faces must necessarily remind us of a sordid, reactionary, and greedy hand which in that day spilled its treasure and the blood of its bravest men in a vain attempt to chain to its chariot wheels those immortal fathers who declared that the United States of America are and of right ought to be free and independent States. England then wanted more taxes to fall into her coffers, more tolls for land grants and charters to come to her lords and her barons, more tribute to her ships of commerce, and in order to receive that reward she tried to conquer the wills, the self-respect of those who had not learned to yield. It took firm men in that day to stand against England, but we had the men and they stood. "Liberty or death" was their slogan.

Our fathers won and England pledged herself to the pursuits of peace and good will. She pledged on her honor to stand by us and to cooperate, but when we most needed her good will, while we were being attacked and our people were being massacred by the Indians, England set about to destroy our merchant ships and to impress our citizens and our sailors into British service.

The story is one of greed and criminal exploitation. We had no option but to fight and we again humbled and whipped England both by land and sea, but not until the superior military power of that country, and the disdain in which we were held in Great Britain, had found expression in the demolition of our Capitol and the burning of our public buildings here at Washington. On the 24th of August, 1814, the British ruffians reached the east Capitol Grounds at 6 in the evening. The new Capitol Building was made the target for their musketry. President Madison and the American Cabinet had been taken unawares, and they escaped into Virginia. Finally, a party of soldiers under the lead of Gen. Ross and Admiral Cockburn forced their way into the Hall of the House of Representatives. Cockburn was escorted to the Speaker's chair and amid raillery and mockery he put this question, "Shall this harbor of Yankee democracy be burned? All for it say 'aye.'" The vote was hearty, riotous, and unanimous. Gen. Ross gave the order to fire the building. Papers and books from the library and desks and furniture were piled up after the manner of vandals, and the building was burned. The troops then went to the White House, in hope of capturing the President and wife, whom they said they wanted to display in England. They forced the locked doors, and after vain search for the desired captives, they applied the torch to the mansion with its library, furniture, and family stores.

ENGLAND PLANNED TO DEFEAT LOUISIANA PURCHASE.

We finally made the treaty of Ghent on December 24, 1814, and on January 8, 1815, Old Hickory won the memorable victory over the British at New Orleans, neither of the generals having learned of the treaty of peace.

In connection with this treaty the generosity and fair dealing of England was again subjected to practical illustration.

The treaty itself provided for the restoration to each of the high contracting parties of all territory, places, and possessions taken by either nation from the other during the war.

Mr. Goulburn, one of the English commissioners, succeeded in injecting into the recorded notes of the proceedings the following two sentences:

> We do not admit Bonaparte's construction of the law of nations. We can not accept it in relation to any subject matter before us.

Thomas Jefferson had just arranged the terms of the Louisiana Purchase with Napoleon. England was preparing in this way to protest against the Louisiana Purchase and to demand the return of that area of this country which to-day furnishes the majority of the adherents of the British view on this floor.

The scheme was all right except that England did not figure on Andy Jackson. She put the pick of the veterans of Waterloo at New Orleans all right to back up her demands, but Jackson's orders to fire at the buckles on the British belts was obeyed to the letter by his Kentucky and Tennessee sharpshooters, and England just let the matter go. With Packenham dead and his army of veterans practically annihilated England gave up the scheme ungrudgingly and philosophized that "Honesty is the best policy."

No doubt it was also suggested then that England would not "know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" if that scheme were not abandoned after the Battle of New Orleans.

ENGLISH DUPLICITY DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

Section 10 of the treaty of Ghent is as follows:

> Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas both His Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object.

As soon as the Civil War commenced England gave every possible encouragement—officially recognizing the Confederacy. The Alabama and Florida, built and manned in British ports, preyed upon the American commerce and wrought terrific damage, almost clearing the seas of American merchant ships. After the Civil War England was compelled to pay heavy damages for these acts.

The tactics of England during the Civil War showed that the Englishman still hoped to see the Republic fail and longed again to substitute British monarchical sovereignty for our beloved republican government.

In the meantime, in 1850, England and America had entered into what was known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which began as follows:

> The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsists between them by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

The treaty provided for joint ownership and joint sovereignty over the canal. Neither party was to obtain "any exclusive control over said ship canal." It was not to be fortified and was to be kept neutral. The contracting parties would obey the just and equitable rules for the government of the canal that might be laid down by the Government or corporation that might construct and own the canal, and the contracting parties were to protect the canal from armed attack or interference. England and the United States were to be joint owners, jointly responsible, and jointly liable in every respect.

That agreement was all right when it was made. It seemed the best the United States could do. Thirty-five years had passed since the impressment of American sailors and citizens and the British outrages against the United States which had caused the War of 1812, and it was believed that we could work with England and that England's help was necessary for this almost superhuman undertaking.

AN AMERICAN CANAL BECAME THE UNIVERSAL DEMAND.

This treaty was agreed to in 1850, but after the dishonest and selfish operations of England during the Civil War and the awakening of American pride upon the consolidation of all the States into one great Republic after the Civil War, sentiment became assertive against any partnership arrangement with England in any enterprise, and more particularly where any question of authority or sovereignty in or about South America was involved.

President Grant declared for "an American canal, on American soil, built by American people," and President Monroe's announcement of the famous doctrine that bears his name became a great American principle. Under that doctrine it at once became impossible for Great Britain to acquire, by any kind of maneuver, a share in an interoceanic canal on the Western Hemisphere. Nearly every President and State Department contributed by turns to the correspondence and helped in creating a determined public opinion for an American canal. England insisted on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and there was but slight progress toward a solution of the diplomatic differences between Great Britain and the United States. The transcontinental railroads acquired great power in the country, and it was believed that their influence was much in the way of a solution of the problem. One thing was determined upon, however, that the canal, when built, should be an American canal, and that there should be no joint control or ownership with England. President Cleveland's action in the Venezuela incident thrilled and unified American sentiment for American supremacy over Old World activities in South America. Compromise, or half-and-half sovereignty, as taxation without representation, was impossible in 1776.

President Hayes, in March, 1880, said:

The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to surrender this control to any European power. It is the right and duty of the United States to assert and maintain such supervision and authority over any interoceanic canal across the Isthmus that connects North and South America as will protect our national interest.

President Harrison declared:

Our national policy, now more than ever, calls for its control by this Government.

James G. Blaine, President Harrison's Secretary of State, rang out with emphasis and with the clearness of the bell that once pealed forth for liberty at Independence Hall, the American position which it was impossible to compromise to the slightest degree.

He said:

It is as regards the political control of such a canal as distinguished from its merely administrative or commercial regulation that the President feels called upon to speak with directness and with emphasis. During any war to which the United States of America or the United States of Colombia might be a party, the passage of armed vessels of a hostile nation through the Canal of Panama would be no more admissible than would be passage of the armed forces of a hostile nation over the railway lines joining the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the United States or of Colombia. And the United States of America will insist upon her right to take all needful precautions against the possibility of the Isthmus transit being in any event used offensively against her interests upon the land or upon the sea.

The two Republics between which the guaranty of neutrality and possession exists have analogous conditions with respect to their territorial extension. Both have a long line of coast on either ocean to protect as well as to improve. The possessions of the United States upon the Pacific coast are imperial in extent and of extraordinary growth. Even at their present stage of development they would supply the larger part of the traffic which would seek the advantages of the canal. The States of California and Oregon, and the Territory of Washington, larger in area than England and France, produce for export more than a ton of wheat for each inhabitant, and the entire freights demanding water transportation eastward, already enormous, are augmenting each year with accelerating ratio.

As to our duty under the treaty with Colombia, Mr. Blaine let Great Britain and the courts of Europe know that—

There has never been the slightest doubt on the part of the United States as to the purpose or extent of the obligation then assumed, by which it became surety alike for the free transit of the world's commerce over whatever land way or waterway might be opened from sea to sea and for the protection of the territorial rights of Colombia from aggression or interference of any kind. Nor has there ever been room to question the full extent of the advantages and benefits, naturally due to its geographical position and political relations on the Western Continent, which the United States obtained from the owner of the isthmian territory in exchange for that far-reaching and responsible guaranty.

These might be termed "hot words" to be used to Great Britain in view of the unfortunate Clayton-Bulwer treaty. But Blaine was an American through and through. He knew it was useless to try to give hints to an Englishman, so he broke the news off in chunks and threw it at them so they would know for all time that there would be no joint ownership with them or with any other European power. That the United States would find some way to build and own and maintain that canal, and that the rules—all of them—would be prescribed by the American Government. James G. Blaine did not fall down and worship at the English shrine. No base surrender on his part, even if he was confronted by that Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was the bane of all American negotiation concerning the canal at that time.

I commend to my colleagues these words of Blaine and ask that they be compared with this uncompromising surrender of President Wilson:

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong.

WE OWE IT ALL TO THEODORE ROOSEVELT, SAYS WILSON.

It was left to Theodore Roosevelt to clear the way for an American interoceanic canal at the Isthmus. If anyone doubts this let him be convinced from the pen of Woodrow Wilson in Epochs of American History, page 349:

* * * And it is to President Roosevelt that we owe the removal of all diplomatic obstacles to the building of the Panama Canal.

Woodrow Wilson, president of Princeton University, on the same page of the same volume, also has the following to say:

The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty—its predecessor having failed because of the refusal of the British Government to accept amendments that had been attached to it in the Senate—was signed November 18, 1901, and ratified by the Senate a month later. It abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and, though with some obscurity of language, gave the assent of Great Britain to exclusive control by the United States of any interoceanic canal to be built by the latter in the Western Hemisphere.

Let this language of Woodrow Wilson, president of Princeton University, be noted:

It [the Hay-Pauncefote treaty] gave the assent of Great Britain to exclusive control by the United States of any interoceanic canal to be built by the latter in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Wilson was a historian then, and a most able one, too, and he caught the philosophy of the historic events he was chronicling and he stated it.

Later, he was a candidate and he took practically the same position in talking to the farmers at Washington Park. But as President he urges surrender to the English view of partial sovereignty and says let us surrender, "right or wrong."

I remember well the discussion on this subject in the eighties. There was an intense desire to dig the canal, but a determination not to go at it in partnership with England.

To meet this demand for an American canal the old obsolete Clayton-Bulwer treaty was finally abrogated and a new treaty, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, was agreed to. It is over the following provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the present controversies arise:

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

There is no doubt in my mind that the words "all nations observing these rules," in paragraph 1 of article 3, has no reference to the United States. It is our Government that adopts and frames the rules for all customers of the canal to be governed by. England admits our contention in this regard when she concedes that we have the right to fortify the canal and that the United States is exempted from the rules so far as its warships are concerned. Page after page of the RECORD has been consumed in citing legal authorities on this point which I believe are convincing and unanswerable.

We have exempted our coastwise ships from paying tolls. Already we have limited the coastwise shipping to American ships, so that the ships of no other nation can participate in our coastwise shipping.

If England is right, and we can not exempt our coastwise ships, then the rule on which England bases her protest compels us to pay tolls on our own warships so as to reduce pro tanto the gross charges levied against the shipping that passes through the canal.

If we admit that we can not discriminate in favor of our merchant ships England may well make another protest as to our warships, revenue cutters, and so forth. The railroad along the canal is a part of the plant. If we have to obey the rules laid down for "all nations observing these rules," then if we allowed our Army or Navy officers to ride on the train on a pass we would have to carry Italian officers and those of other nations on the same terms.

ALL THE RIGHTS INCIDENT TO CONSTRUCTION.

I shall not extend this argument, which has been repeated so often in this debate. It is plain to me that we obtain our rights from the fact of proprietorship, or, as is stated in article 2 of the treaty, we—have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction.

President Roosevelt, in December, 1901, said to Congress:

In this treaty the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty * * * is abrogated. It (the new one) specifically provides that the United States alone shall do the work of building and assume the responsibility of safeguarding the canal, and shall regulate its neutral use by all nations on terms of equality without the guaranty or interference of any outside nation from any quarter.

England is attempting to reassert the rights and authority incidental to joint ownership by protesting against our act in exempting our own coastwise shipping. The exemption seems to meet with approval because it connects our Pacific and Atlantic seaboards and it seems to accord with the American idea of free ports and open harbors and a removal of all obstructions to commerce and freedom of travel between the States.

The President says the exemption of coastwise shipping from tolls is wrong from an economic standpoint. There is ample room for difference of opinion here, but if we could be assured that the transportation charges to the average man would be lower by this exemption there should be no complaint against it.

The Republican candidate for President in the last campaign was for it. The Democratic platform was for it, and the Progressive platform, which we called a contract with the people, was for it. Candidate Woodrow Wilson was for it, and he said so when he was out for votes on August 15, 1912. Here is what he said:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company. You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

The following is found in the Progressive national platform:

The Panama Canal, built and paid for by the American people, must be used primarily for their benefit. We demand that the canal shall be so operated as to break transportation monopoly now held and misused by the transcontinental railroads by maintaining sea competition with them; that ships directly or indirectly owned or controlled by American railroad corporations shall not be permitted to use the canal; and that American ships engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls.

In January, 1913, Col. Roosevelt stated his position as follows:

I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls.

President Taft said, in December, 1912:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Democratic national platform of 1912 contains the following:

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

The most concise and convincing statement of the American position I have discovered is found in the summing up of a most able argument in an address delivered at the seventh annual meeting of the American Society of International Law, in April, 1913, at Washington, D. C., by the Hon. Richard Olney, former Secretary of State, as follows:

1. The United States, as builder and owner of an artificial waterway within its own territory, is entitled to dictate the conditions of its use unless, and only so far, as it has contracted the right away.

2. It has made no such contract except with Great Britain and by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and by the clauses of that treaty which stipulate for the use of the canal by "all nations" on equal terms and for reasonable and equitable tolls.

3. As the term "all nations" comprehends not only States but their nationals, the crucial question is, Are the words "all nations" inclusive or exclusive of the United States and its nationals?

4. The principle is well settled that a State conveys away its rights of sovereignty or property only by terms which are clear and express and are not susceptible of any other reasonable construction. If the terms are vague and of doubtful import, the presumption is against the State's intention to part with or abridge its jurisdictional or property rights.

5. Hence, as the term "all nations" as used in the treaty may be taken to mean either all without exception or all except the United States, the latter meaning is to be accepted as the true one because the least restrictive of the normal rights and powers of the United States.

6. But it is unnecessary to rely upon presumption. The treaty assumes the United States to be the owner of a canal to be built by it on its own territory and must be taken to have had as its natural and legitimate aim the fixing of the terms upon which other nations might use it. Except as necessarily abridged by such terms, nothing in the treaty indicates any purpose to further abridge the rights of the United States as canal builder and owner.

7. In short, the treaty is an instrument by which the proprietor of a canal fixes and states the terms of use to its customers.

There is an utter absence of evidence that the United States regarded itself as one of its customers.

8. The neutralization proposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty resembles that proposed by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty only in the idea that the operating charges and rules for use of the canal shall be the same for all nations. It differs, of course, in the vital feature of conditioning such equality of terms upon protection being afforded to the canal.

9. When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States, it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant so to apply.

10. The different phases of American public and official sentiment respecting the canal are noteworthy and not to be overlooked in construing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

While the United States was expecting to be merely one of the users of the canal, it strenuously insisted upon equality of rules and charges for the use of the canal and did not concern itself about the rights of the canal owner.

When the rôle of builder and owner of the canal was forced upon it, it as strenuously insisted upon complete ownership and complete control and complete elimination of all foreign participation or control.

Its purposes and views are completely defeated, if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is to be construed according to the British contention, and the United States has lost the ordinary and normal right of the canal owner to be exempt from the tolls and charges it makes to customers.

Notwithstanding all these facts and the arguments that are presented, President Wilson asks us to abandon the American position, admit we are caught by England in the very act of doing a dishonorable thing. Yet he gives us no reason for thus abandoning all logic and accepting the English view. He says.

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

We are confronted with exactly the opposite advice by two living ex-Presidents, by the able Speaker of this House, CHAMP CLARK, by the leaders of all the parties on the floor of the House.

I shall vote for the American position, without consideration of the economic proposition, as it becomes of slight importance as compared with the importance of the treaty and its interpretation for all time to come.

It may be worth while, however, to consider again some of the economic phases of this matter, and when that time does come, I now say that I shall not in any manner be bound by my vote here to-day. I am not at all fond of the idea of ship subsidy. Sometimes I doubt the soundness of the policy which permits privately owned ships to have the exclusive privilege of coastwise traffic.

AN ALLEGORICAL STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

Once upon a time in a certain city there were quite a large number of labor unions. One of these was the Butchers' Union, with one of its members, Henry Lytton Bulwer, as manager of the affairs of the union. Another was the Carpenters' Union, with John M. Clayton as its manager. Both of these unions were composed of high-minded, intelligent men, but, naturally enough, each looked out for its own special interest. These unions desired a central meeting place or labor temple so situated that all the members could have a common place of assembly and business location, where they could get together handily and hold their fraternal and business conferences. It so happened that the Butchers' Union and the Carpenters' Union each had a claim on the lot which was the only satisfactory and available place for the temple. So they entered into an agreement providing for joint construction and joint ownership, with the understanding that all the other unions should have the right to use the temple and establish headquarters there on just and equitable terms, the two unions, through their representatives, making an agreement to that effect, which was known as the Clayton-Bulwer agreement.

Then came delay and money was slow, and the carpenters' union, which had its temporary building already on a part of the desired lot, and had the best claim of title to it, became terribly distressed by an awful internal dispute that threatened its destruction; and while this was going on the butchers' union sent a lot of trouble makers to encourage the split, with the hope of getting the property itself, and finally sent one of its members named Alabama to shoot the building full of holes, Alabama being finally killed in self-defense by a carpenter named Kearsarge.

Finally, however, the carpenters got together again and entered suit against their enemies and made them pay a large sum for damages inflicted by them in treacherous disregard of all fair and honorable dealing. Then the carpenters repaired their building and absolutely refused to confer any more with the butchers' union about joint construction. "The temple must be erected," they said, "but when it is erected we will build it. Although we are willing for all our brothers to use the building on terms of equality, there shall be no more partnership."

They elected—well, not exactly elected, but he got in some way—a member named R. B. Hayes as president, and he made a public declaration in which he said:

The temple shall not be built till it can be constructed, owned, and managed by the carpenters' union alone. If that Clayton-Bulwer agreement is in the way, we will have to get rid of it.

Then they had a secretary named James G. Blaine, and he was an enthusiastic member of the order, eloquent, and all the members trusted him. One time at a regular meeting he broke loose almost in a passion and declared:

We stand for equal use of this temple by all the unions who care to occupy it; but the butchers' union is one of the strongest and most ambitious and determined of all who want to use it. We want them to use it, but we'll fight before we yield in our contention for absolute ownership and control of this temple, and what's more than that, we now have the money to build it, and it will not be built till we do it.

Then all the carpenters joined together and demanded that the old agreement be abrogated and a new one made. The butchers appointed a member named Pauncefote, and the carpenters named John Hay, a noble high-minded member. So they made the Hay-Pauncefote agreement, by which the butchers' union gave up all its claims and agreed that the carpenters' union should build and own the temple and "have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the temple." It was further provided that all the unions obeying the rules should have the right to use the building on terms of equality.

Then the president of the carpenters' union, a man named Theodore Roosevelt, bought the lot from the real owners and found that in truth the butchers had no interest any way in it, but they were determined to keep the agreement to the letter. They constructed a magnificent temple at a large expense and fixed the rental rate at less than the necessary upkeep charges. They figured how much their own members would use the building and allowed for that much to come out of general dues, but published a notice to these members, who had put up every cent for the construction of the building, that they could use it free of any stipulated rent. Then came the butchers with a protest at this privilege granted to the members of the carpenters' union. They said it was a subsidy, a special privilege.

What did the carpenters do? Hayes and Blaine and Cleveland and Roosevelt had passed out of office. Their president was W. H. Taft. He told the butchers plainly that the carpenters' union owned and controlled that building, and that if they wanted to hang around there they would have to pay their rent and obey the rules. "Hall right," said the head butcher, "we just thought we'd ask about it. Nothing like trying, you know, and it does gall us mightily to see these carpenters looking so wise around here as the howners of this building."

There were two very popular members of the carpenters' union, one known far and wide for his eloquence and the other was known as a great reformer. Both of them stood by the temple program. The eloquent man had the plan written into the by-laws of the union, and then he said to a great audience:

Any member of this union who would go back on those by-laws, or any part of them, would steal or embezzle money. Why, embezzling money would be as nothing compared with going back on those sacred rules.

The great reformer became a candidate for president of the carpenters' union, and the eloquent one supported him at a great meeting of the union that lasted for days. While he was a candidate for that office he was asked what he thought about the rules, and particularly about the temple program.

The temple program—

He replied—

Why, I'm for that heart and soul. We don't pass rules merely to catch new members. Our rules are not molasses to catch flies. We mean business. Why, when I was writing a history on page 349 of Epochs of American History, I said that Hay-Pauncefote agreement gave us complete control of that temple. Go back on that? Well, I guess not. Didn't my great and eloquent friend say that any man who would go back on those rules would steal? Not on your life. The great object in constructing that building is to allow carpenters who reside near to have a place of meeting. If you vote for me, you can depend on me on that proposition. That's one thing I know all about and have studied carefully.

He was elected president, and very soon the butchers caught him and his eloquent friend in an awful pinch, the details of which have never been learned, and a new committee came and vehemently protested against the temple program and the use of the temple by its members without special assessments, and then it was that Woodrow Wilson called the members together and said:

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation. Really we owe that much to the butchers' union.

If the board of trustees acts favorably on the advice of their president, what do you suppose the carpenters will do to the board?

LET US NOT FORECLOSE OUR RIGHT TO CONSIDER THAT FEATURE.

It is my belief that Members of Congress are too prone to forget the real and only legitimate excuse for any legislation which carries with it an apparent special privilege. Under conditions as they arise from time to time the public is compelled to assign to private parties titles to land, franchise rights, and privileges, but no such assignment or grant should ever be made unless it will result in the end in reducing the burdens that rest upon the people of the country. We too often forget that it is our prime duty to abolish tolls and burdens that rest upon the people. The toll that we should abolish is the right of exploitation. If the exemption of coastwise ships from Panama Canal tolls will reduce the burdens upon the people generally, such exemption is right, whether you call it a subsidy, special privilege, a subvention, or anything else. If the effect of the exemption is to increase the burdens upon the backs of the people generally it is wrong, no matter what name you give it.

It has been a time-honored policy of this country to exempt ships from tolls in all our harbors and rivers, and thus far there has been no protest raised anywhere against such exemption. No cry has gone up against the improvements of the harbors of this country at public expense because the ships which use the harbors do not pay tolls. The people do not want tolls charged against American commerce in the harbors and rivers of our country whether they want tolls at Panama or not.

But if we pass this repeal bill and thereby interpret the treaty with England to mean that we can not exempt our coastwise ships, we forever debar ourselves from considering that question on its merits, notwithstanding the treasure we have invested in response to public sentiment, notwithstanding the American canal we have constructed with American money without any form of partnership or joint ownership with England or any other nation. We will find ourselves, if we interpret this treaty as President Wilson desires it interpreted, bound and gagged just as effectively as England ever tried to bind and gag us under the old Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with this difference, that England is now relieved from all the burdens she had to bear under the joint-ownership plan of that old abrogated treaty. In the words of the cartoonist, John Bull can say, "Hall my hown and not a hof-pence to pay."

England uses the Suez Canal as a means of holding up the commerce of the world for tolls far in excess of the cost of operating the canal, as can be seen by the following carefully prepared statement taken from the Washington Post:

The Suez Canal is owned by a stock company with shares of capital stock numbering 379,241. Since 1875 the British Government has been the owner of 176,602 of these shares, for which it paid $19,855,320.

Through its holding of these shares the British Government exercises a controlling interest in the Suez Canal.

The canal cost about $127,000,000; is 103 miles long, about 28 feet deep, and it takes 17 hours for vessels to traverse it.

During the year 1910 the Suez Canal was traversed by 4,533 vessels with a total net tonnage of 16,581,898, and the toll charges were $1.30 per net ton for vessels with cargo, 82 cents per net ton for vessels in ballast, and $1.93 for each passenger over 12 years of age.

The total receipts of the canal company for the year amounted to $25,168,400, the cost of operation and maintenance to $3,857,402. Payments for fixed charges and in retired capital obligations aggregated $6,072,602.

The company's net profits were $15,908,419, allowing the payment of a dividend of 31 per cent on the canal company's shares.

The outstanding capital obligations amounted to $92,484,544 at the close of the year 1910.

The Panama Canal, costing the United States more than three times the cost of the Suez Canal is to let English ships through at about 10 per cent less than the Suez rate. Yet John Bull is not satisfied.

THE UNDERWOOD TARIFF CARRIES A BIGGER SHIP SUBSIDY.

It has been said that no true Democrat can obey the plank of the Baltimore platform which provides for free tolls because it is an illegitimate plank in that platform and is a violation of a fundamental Democratic principle which is one of the corner stones of Democracy, to wit, "Equal rights to all and special privilege to none." Certain Democrats by this argument read out of their party all those who would obey this so-called illegitimate plank, which violates the alleged corner stone of Democracy. On this reasoning every Democrat who voted for the Underwood tariff bill could be read out of the Democratic Party. So easy is it to find excuses for violating a party platform which a designing politician may desire to violate.

If voting for an American shipping preference is Democratic heresy, then those who voted for the Underwood tariff bill voted for a heresy against the party. There is incorporated in the provisions of the Underwood bill a subsidy or rebate to American ships of 5 per cent of all duties levied under the tariff bill against goods which are imported into this country in American bottoms. In other words, American ships enjoy an exemption from tariff tolls amounting to 5 per cent of the duty, and American ships passing through the canal enjoy an exemption from canal tolls amounting to about $1.25 a ton. It has been estimated that the Panama Canal exemption will net American ships $1,000,000 per annum, and if it be a ship subsidy it is a $1,000,000 subsidy. The Underwood tariff exemption, or subsidy, by the best figures obtainable, amounts to $1,700,000 per year, and is thus nearly twice as great as the Panama Canal exemption. From the subsidy standpoint there is no difference except that the Democratic tariff subsidy is nearly twice as great as the canal-tolls subsidy. But from another viewpoint the tariff subsidy is infinitely more offensive to the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" than is the canal-tolls exemption. At the canal all American freight receives the same consideration of $1.25 or more per ton, and if there is any discrimination at all the exemption is of the greatest benefit to those who have to buy the necessaries of life—the things which the Democratic tariff put on the free list to reduce the high cost of living. But in the case of the Underwood tariff exemption, or subsidy, or subvention, or whatever you call it, it is only the dutiable goods that enjoy the privilege.

A boatload of automobiles would receive a tremendous subsidy under the tariff subsidy, but a boatload of agricultural implements would receive no benefits whatever. These two ships at Panama would get the same per ton exemption under the canal act. Then the Democratic tariff subsidy is for foreign goods solely and the Panama subsidy is for American goods solely.

So you see that the Members of this House who voted for the Underwood tariff can not possibly be rated as Democrats under the rule laid down in this debate, and the only Democrats in the House are those Republicans and Progressives who voted against the tariff bill. I could not qualify, because I voted for the bill and am glad of it. I read my platform as a pledge to immediately revise the tariff downward.

It is easy enough to find an excuse to violate a platform pledge, but, in my opinion, the people of this country are not going to accept such excuses, but will hold to strict account those who violate their pledge.

THE TIMBER TRUST; BUT HOW ABOUT UNCLE SAM'S TIMBER?

A great deal has been said here about the Timber Trust; that free tolls would merely increase the value of the timber holdings on the Pacific coast; but is it possible that the Members of this House have forgotten that the United States Government is one of the greatest individual owners of timberland in the great Northwest? The United States Government owns about 600,000,000,000 feet of standing timber in the Northwest, worth a billion dollars. If by lowering freight rates you increase the value of that timber to the American people 1 per cent, you increase the wealth of the Government $10,000,000. The Government owns unlimited supplies of coal in Alaska, which must be brought out on the Government railroad in Alaska. If by lowering freight rates you increase the use and value of this coal to the people of this country, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, you make the people just that much richer. In so far as we subsidize Uncle Sam's coal and Uncle Sam's timber, there surely can be no objection.

WHAT ABOUT UNCLE SAM'S COAL IN ALASKA?

I want to see Alaska coal on the market in competition with privately mined coal in the States proper. I want to see fair and decent mining conditions prevail in Alaska, so that labor does not have to be exploited, and I want the United States Government to come to the aid of these plans, and I do not want an interpretation of this treaty that will forever prevent our bringing American-owned ships, loaded with American-mined coal, through the canal free of tolls, if we so desire. I hold this to be none of England's business.

Freight rates determine the territory in which the timber of the Northwest can be sold at a profit. At present the all-rail rate on lumber from the Pacific coast to New York is 75 cents per 100 pounds. This is equal to a rate of $15 per thousand feet board measure on flooring, $18 to $19.50 on dimension and common boards, $22.50 on timbers not green, and $24.75 on rough green lumber and timbers. The rate from Louisiana points to New York is 35 cents per 100 pounds on yellow pine, which is equivalent to about one-half of the Pacific coast rate on the different timber products. Thus the yellow-pine manufacturer starts in the game with an advantage over the fir manufacturer of $7.25 on flooring, $8.50 to $10 on dimension and common boards, and $9 on timbers. This handicap amounts practically to a prohibition.

WHO PAYS FOR AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE ON THE COAST?

It is not believed that shipment of American lumber in American ships through the Panama Canal at the present time will greatly benefit the lumber manufacturers of the Northwest. The provision which excludes foreign ships from American coastwise trade becomes a much greater burden on shippers from coast to coast through the Panama Canal than are the tolls to foreign ships. In other words, the subsidy or privilege to coastwise ships by which they have a monopoly of shipping in that sphere costs the shippers much more than the tolls at Panama. This situation is brought about on two accounts: First, low wages on foreign ships; and, second, comparative size and capacity of foreign and domestic ships. The exclusion of foreign ships from coastwise traffic may be a mistaken economic policy or it may not. I am aware it seems a source of pride to know we have some American bottoms doing business somewhere. It awakens and stirs the soul of patriotism to see the American flag on the seas once in a while, if it is only at home, but all this glory is now at the expense of the coast shippers, and the situation in this regard will be greatly emphasized by the opening of the canal.

A foreign ship could drop into Seattle and take a cargo of lumber to New York cheaper than an American bottom, as already stated, because wages on the foreign bottom are lower, interest and insurance are lower, and I do not doubt the monopoly to coastwise ships encourages a trust agreement involving a higher rate. But the other reason—the size and capacity of the ships—is a potent factor. Lumber, to be economically handled in very long distance shipments, should be shipped in large vessels carrying from four to six million feet. Heretofore only foreign commerce has warranted such vessels, and our coastwise vessels do not have such capacities.

COAST SHIPPERS MAY OBJECT TO BURDEN.

I call to the attention of the House the following correspondence, which will show that the coastwise exemption is subject to grave question in business centers on the Pacific coast:

GRAYS HARBOR LUMBER CO.,
Hoquiam, Wash., March 5, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: About a week ago we asked a foreign lumber buyer for Balfour-Guthrie & Co., of Portland, Oreg., what would be the probable rates on lumber from British Columbia to New York through the Panama Canal. He stated that at the present rate of freight it would be about $7 per thousand feet. The lowest freight rate that we had been promised in American bottoms through the canal is $13, leaving a difference in favor of Canadian lumber of $6 per thousand feet in freight rate alone; and even if we should get a small reduction in freight rate, we will never be able to successfully compete with that competition. Therefore the present law admitting coastwise shipping in American bottoms through the canal free of toll should stand, unless at the same time our laws be so changed that we be allowed to ship from coast to coast in foreign ships. On the whole, we are inclined to agree with Mr. Chadwick that no toll for American ships is not right, but it is much less right to give the British Columbia shippers such an advantage over us that they will practically control the lumber trade of the Atlantic Coast States to the detriment and exclusion of American product. In other words, it is a proposition to turn our own home trade over to a foreign nation. British Columbia is allowed to ship lumber into South Africa free of duty, which we think is perfectly right with the two countries being under English dominion; but why should we give them the advantage in shipping into our own country when we have to pay duty shipping into South Africa?

The foreign ship will also have great advantage over the American in carrying lumber from here to the Atlantic coast, as they can then accept a cargo from there to any part of the world, whereas the American ship will practically be forced to come back again to this coast, whether she can get a cargo or not, as they will not be prepared or equipped to enter the foreign trade. The reason for this, we think, is well understood, considering the original cost of investment and then the additional cost of operation.

We hope that you will see that this matter is brought to the attention of the President, so that he may be able to do justice to the American people as well as he is now trying to be just and fair to the English nation, even though it may be at the expense of our own people. This is a matter of very great importance to the Pacific coast, but we believe it is of much greater importance to the Southern States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, as the British Columbia lumber will no doubt utterly ruin their trade along the Atlantic coast. It may take a little time for the American operator to get into British Columbia and produce his lumber, but if the laws are left as at present we can assure you it will not take very long. We believe you will find the southern yellow-pine manufacturer will be hurt far more by this unfair competition than we will on the Pacific coast.

Yours, very truly,

GRAYS HARBOR LUMBER CO.,
BY N. J. BLAGEN.

The following telegram further illustrates the point:

TACOMA, WASH., March 11–12, 1914.

Representative J. W. BRYAN,
Washington, D. C.:

This organization, representing majority of Tacoma shippers, requests your most energetic opposition to the repeal of free tolls provision of Panama Canal act, at least until navigation laws are amended allowing American coastwise ships to operate on equality with foreign vessels, or coastwise commerce is allowed free use of all ships regardless of nationality. Repeal of this concession to American coastwise ships will work incalculable harm to Pacific coast commercial interests. We stand steadfast in our belief that present conditions justify free tolls for American coastwise vessels.

TRANSPORTATION BUREAU,
JAY W. MCCUNE.

I made the following answer to the telegram:

MARCH 12, 1914.

Mr. JAY W. MCCUNE,
Transportation Bureau, Chamber of Commerce, Tacoma, Wash.

MY DEAR MR. MCCUNE: I am just in receipt of your wire urging opposition to the repeal of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act. I note with great interest the further suggestion or qualification in your message, as follows: "At least until navigation laws are amended allowing American coastwise ships to operate on equality with foreign vessels or coastwise commerce is allowed free use of all ships, regardless of nationality."

This constitutes a very interesting suggestion. I am not very much carried away with the English argument on this matter. I have, however, feared that the coastwise steamship companies, dominated as they always will be by the railroads, will not grant to the people who pay transportation charges the benefit of these free tolls, and that they will hold the rates up to the same plane as rates on shipping from British Columbia points, for instance. I would be much more enthusiastic for free tolls if I felt that the public would get the benefit of these free tolls.

I look forward to the time when the Government will own this entire transportation proposition, including the coastwise shipping, and will reduce traffic rates to actual cost. I absolutely abhor the idea of permitting a few men any longer to collect and make tremendous fortunes out of transportation charges. I believe this to be a governmental function and do not believe the matter will be rightly settled until Uncle Sam carries the lumber and other products free of all profit for transportation. I believe that day is coming and that the construction of the Alaska Railroad is merely a beginning along that line.

With kind regards,

Very truly, yours, J. W. BRYAN.

So, my colleagues, you will observe that you are building your American merchant marine, shouting for Old Glory, retaining ships in American register for naval use and exigency in case of war at the expense of coast shippers. The people of the great and ever growing State of Washington are not wanting in patriotism; but when you prate about what you are giving to the Shipping Trust, just please remember that you are not taking anything from your own resources to give to the Shipping Trust. What you are giving to them you are taking from the coast shippers. It is understood that our lumbermen are to get a rate of from $11 to $12 per thousand board feet through the canal, to which must be added the tolls, if the English view prevails; but western Canada is to get a rate of $10 per thousand board feet, including the canal tolls. Is there any justice about any such arrangement as that? You gentlemen are perfectly willing for Pacific coast shippers to go down into their pockets to maintain American ships, paying a considerable excess freight rate, but when it comes to helping a little with the canal you say you would like to do it, but John Bull objects. You will probably get away with it, but there must be an adjustment somewhere. We coast people are not going to always supply you land terrapins with a merchant marine, an American flag on the sea, and Navy transports in case of emergency at our own expense.

THE REAL SOLUTION—A GOVERNMENT-OWNED MERCHANT MARINE.

In my opinion the only solution is a Government-owned merchant marine. It is plain that the preference given American vessels by prohibiting foreign vessels from entering the coastwise trade can not continue always. The shippers on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts will not pay the price which this discrimination compels them to pay very long. Why should not the Government own and operate these vessels and prohibit any vessel passing through the canal conveying freight or passengers for hire from coast to coast except Government vessels? Let us take over for the Government all this traffic. Why should private shipowners take a toll from coastwise traffic? The whole people have to first chart the waters by sweeping and safeguarding the channels. Then lighthouses and safeguards to navigation must be established and maintained at public expense, buoys have to be anchored and kept in place, life-saving stations are necessary, and crews with ocean tugs must scout the shore and be ever ready, at public expense, to succor those in distress or peril. The harbors and landing places must be dredged or otherwise improved by jetties, sea walls, and structures.

All the rules of navigation must be provided after expensive hearings and great outlay. Enemies of navigation have to be run down and the vessels have to be protected from interference. Then the people have to pay for inspecting the hulls, the boilers, and every feature of construction. Every wreck must be investigated, and all those that occupy posts of responsibility on the vessels have to be licensed. All this has to be done at public expense.

Then the Government wants its mails hauled, wants the option to use the vessels in case of war, wants its freight and its troops transported, and for all such service must pay heavily. Whenever any expense is to be incurred the people must put up the money, but when the money begins to come in for freight and passenger services such money must, every cent of it, go into private pockets. Why? The people must maintain a tremendous establishment on the sea. Why not use these vessels for training American seamen for the service of the country and let the traffic pay the bills? Why not haul freight at cost? Why should private shipping interests get one cent of toll out of the great public utility of the sea, so far as our own coastwise shipping is concerned? The Government can establish the monopoly in its own hands so easily. Let us take over at a reasonable price such boats as are now in the coastwise traffic as are suitable, and then let us construct new vessels, modern and up to date, to make up the deficiency. Let us put these vessels into the South American trade as well as the coastwise trade, giving our manufacturers and laborers the benefit of cost transportation for American goods into the markets of South America, and thus vitalize and extend the usefulness of the Monroe doctrine. America for Americans is right. The people stand for it, and if the boats do have to operate at a slight cost no one would feel so bad about it when they realized that no private concern was pocketing the proceeds of a subsidy.

Transportation is a governmental function. All profit, all graft, all watered stock should be eliminated, and the whole business be operated for and by the people.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore July 3, 1912, says:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

In conformity with this platform pledge Congress enacted a law, which was approved August 24, 1912, allowing ships engaged in our coastwise trade to pass through the canal without paying tolls. We are now told by the President that we should repeal that law.

I yield to no one in my admiration for President Wilson. I admire his clearness of vision, his rare power of comprehension, his high sense of duty, his fine courage, and splendid patriotism. I am proud of what he has accomplished since he became President.

Hitherto he has been in the right as it is given to me to see the right, but in his position, in this matter of free tolls for American coastwise vessels passing through the canal I am constrained, in spite of my great admiration for him, to differ from his conclusions and stand by the platform.

If I did not consider it a matter of fundamental importance, a matter directly involving our right to manage our domestic affairs in our own way, without foreign dictation, it might be different.

In the discussion of the question it has been repeatedly stated on the floor that while the Democratic platform contains a free-toll plank it also contains a plank against trusts and monopolies, and some gentlemen—lawyers, too—say that provision furnishes an excuse for ignoring the provision as to free tolls.

Then the Government wants its mails hauled, wants the well known to every lawyer that if a statute, or indeed any written instrument, contains a general statement and a particular or specific statement on the same matter, the specific statement will prevail over the general one. [Applause.] No general statement on that subject matter could nullify or overcome the specific platform pledge I have quoted. [Applause.]

The second answer is that the Panama Canal act contains in section 11 a drastic provision prohibiting the use of the canal by ships owned or controlled by railroads competing with the canal, and another equally drastic provision prohibiting the use of it to ships owned or controlled by any trust or combination in the nature of a trust. Hence there is no conflict and no choice between these planks of the platform. Both must stand. [Applause.]

I will not quote the eloquent and forceful language of the President or of the very able Secretary of State as to the duty of the party to live up to its platform pledges; they are known to all and they are very emphatic.

So great, however, is my confidence in the soundness of the President's judgment that when he announced his position on the tolls question I challenged my own conclusions and the wisdom of the platform pledge. But in the last analysis it is my own judgment that I must follow in serving my constituents, and I am sure the President would himself say that it was my duty to follow it.

Since the matter has been reopened I have given it such additional study as time and circumstances and my capacity would permit, and I am still so convinced of the soundness and wisdom and patriotism of the platform declaration that I could not vote against it and retain my self-respect. I assure you I have not come to this conclusion without careful deliberation.

There are, from Great Britain's point of view, a number of reasons moving her to action. I can only deal with a few of them. The material interests of the Dominion of Canada are involved. Canada has one railway which practically spans the continent. She is building another which, when completed, will reach from ocean to ocean. It will, for the most part, pass through new and sparsely settled country; indeed, through much territory entirely without population. It will not, at least for some time, be overburdened with business, and it is more than probable that much of the interoceanic business it would otherwise get will be diverted to the canal route. The Government of Canada is very largely involved in a financial way in the new line, and many British investors are involved financially in both lines.

If our coastwise vessels have to pay tolls in the canal, the cost of carriage by water will be increased to the extent of the toll to the advantage of these Canadian transcontinental lines.

These great interests can hardly be expected to remain quiescent under such circumstances, hence the pressure from that source to repeal the free-tolls provision of the present law. The same reasoning applies in a greater or less degree to our own transcontinental railways.

I propose to limit my discussion of the question to a few of the more substantial reasons given for repeal.

First. It is said the law which it is proposed to repeal is in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and, second, it is claimed that the law is in the nature of a subsidy and therefore economically wrong.

Does the exemption from toll of our coastwise ships contravene the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

That treaty was proclaimed on February 22, 1902. The preamble to the treaty recites that the contracting parties—

> Being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

The United States, as the owner of the canal, was to formulate rules for its use. Rule 1, thus formulated, reads in part:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

A material question is: Does the phrase "all nations" as used here include the United States or does it refer only to all other nations than the United States?

In determining that question the language of the treaty itself gives some help. Article 2 concedes that the United States has a peculiar interest in the canal—an interest entirely different from that of any other nation. By it the United States is to pay all the costs and expenses of every kind. Subject to the provisions of the treaty, it is to enjoy every right incident to the construction of the canal, and it is to have the exclusive right of regulating and managing it. It does not have to consult any other nation. It is thus put in a class by itself, and all other nations are put outside that class.

Consistently with this grouping or classification, the United States alone is to make a code of rules for neutralizing the canal, and it seems clear to me that such neutralization applies only to those nations in the other group or class; that is, nations other than the United States. It would be an unreasonable and impracticable thing to give to one party to an agreement the right to make rules of neutralization which were to include that party. That would be in a sense equivalent to making it a judge to try its own case. But if that one party, being the owner, were authorized to make rules for the equal use of and equal rights in the canal for all others than itself, the scheme would be both reasonable and practicable. In order to accommodate his neighbors a farmer agrees that persons who observe certain rules may take a short cut across his land. But can he drive across his own land only in conformity with these rules?

In pursuance of the provision in article 2, the United States adopted rules, substantially like those embodied in the treaty of Constantinople for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. Rule 1, as I have stated, provides that the canal shall be free to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality.

If we keep in mind the grouping or classification I have suggested, this provision is also just and reasonable. The United States, constituting class 1, owns the ground, built the canal absolutely at its own expense and without even a suggestion of help from any other nation. The other nations, constituting the other group or class, contributed absolutely nothing; hence, for that reason as well as for other reasons, they should all be treated alike, as the rule provides. Consider for a moment the parties to this treaty as individuals arranging the terms of a contract. What was the thought in the mind of the first party to the agreement? What motives and what considerations probably actuated that party? To answer that question, let us take note of some of the then existing circumstances and conditions.

The first point to attract our attention is the events of the Spanish-American War. Our Atlantic coast was threatened by the enemy's fleet. Our best battleship was in the Pacific Ocean, many thousand miles away, and had to come back by way of Cape Horn. Everyone remembers with what anxiety the American people followed the gallant Clark and his gallant ship, the Oregon, in its memorable trip around the cape. Out of that suspense and the military necessity which caused it, the Panama Canal was born. This incident merely illustrated, indeed demonstrated, the military necessity for a canal. The industrial and commercial need of it had long been apparent, but not quite so pressing. Transcontinental railways had been combining and charging exorbitant rates to the great detriment of business. Indeed, we suffered in many ways for want of an Isthmian Canal.

Can any rational person say that it was our intention to pay $10,000,000 for the land and undertake the building of the greatest work man has undertaken since he inhabited the earth, at an expense of $400,000,000, primarily to meet the necessities of our public defense and then give our enemy, whoever that enemy might be, equal advantage in it with ourselves? It is unthinkable. Speaking on this point, Prof. Butte, of Heidelberg, Germany, well says:

> He deceives himself grievously who believes the United States made the stupendous sacrifice of human energy and public money necessary to build the Panama Canal, "the greatest liberty man has ever taken with nature," with any other purpose in view than the national advantage of the United States—commercial and, above all, political advantage.

He further says:

> From the standpoint of abstract justice, the pretension of Great Britain that she should be put on the same footing as respects the use and enjoyment of the Panama Canal as the United States seems preposterous.

Clearly under the existing conditions it must have been understood that the phrase "all nations" applies only to nations other than our own, and it was for these others the United States was to lay down rules for the equal use of the canal. Any other construction, it seems to me, shocks common sense. This provision, if taken literally, makes the canal free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality. If the United States is not in a separate class from the other nations—if it is to be classed with "all nations" observing these rules—its warships must be treated like all others under this provision. If our battleships go through the canal, so shall the enemy's battleships go through. If the United States is to be included in the phrase "all nations," there is no other way to interpret this provision, and wherein would our national defense be bettered by our great undertaking?

To make this point clear, I refer to the rules adopted by the United States for the government of the canal:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.
> 2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.
>
> 3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service. Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of belligerents.
> 4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.
>
> 5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.
> 6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be a part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

If the United States is included in the phrase "all nations," these rules apply to it as to all others.

Rule 2 provides that the canal shall never be blockaded, nor any right of war exercised in it. True, we may have a military police force to preserve order in it and keep our warships from gaining any advantage over an enemy, because we built it.

Under rule 3 we must chase ourselves through the canal with the least possible delay regardless of conditions.

One of our battleships may be in danger from a superior force in the Pacific and go into the canal, either for safety or to pass through to the Atlantic. But in the meantime a superior force appears in the Caribbean. What will be done? Well, if the United States is included in the phrase "all nations," the rule applies to it, and the American military police, under the rule, must chase the American ship out of the canal and, under rule 5, out of the adjacent waters within 24 hours, to go to certain destruction or to capture. American sailors have always known how to die, and they have not forgotten how. But I seriously question whether they would be justified in sacrificing their lives for a country that would spend $400,000,000 for a canal primarily for the national defense and then graciously hand it over to the country's enemies.

If the United States, the builder and the owner of the canal, is included in the phrase "all nations," we are forced into this very absurd situation; but if—as undoubtedly is the case—the United States is in a class by itself and "all nations" other than it are in the other class, these rules are entirely fair and reasonable.

In submitting this treaty to the Senate for ratification the joint author of it, Mr. John Hay, then Secretary of State, said:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

And he might have added the United States agrees to treat all the other nations with impartial equality.

He surely thought the United States would get some strategic advantage from this marvelous accomplishment.

In view of the conditions which led to and justified the construction of the canal, and to which I have just referred, I repeat that to so construe the language of the treaty as to include the United States in the phrase "all nations" seems to me very absurd. Congress certainly understood that the United States was not to be classed with the other nations with regard to the use of the canal or with regard to our rights in it when it provided by a later treaty that the Republic of Panama, which once owned the Canal Zone, shall be taken out of the other class of nations and its ships given the right of free passage through it, and a treaty with Colombia giving her, as the former owner of the Canal Zone, similar rights and privileges has been ratified by the Senate, but never accepted by that Republic.

The United States acting alone in adopting rules for the neutralization of its canal adopted substantially the same rules which were adopted by England, Germany, Spain, France, Italy, Belgium, Russia, and Turkey in the treaty for the neutralization of the Suez Canal.

Article 1 of that treaty reads:

> The Suez Maritime Canal shall always be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to every vessel of commerce and of war without distinction of flag. Consequently the high contracting parties agree not in any way to interfere with the free use of the canal in time of war as in time of peace.

A comparison of this language with rule 1 for the Panama Canal shows that the rules are substantially alike. How has England interpreted this provision? Has she done anything "to interfere with the free use of the canal" by an enemy in time of war? And in this connection it must be remembered that England's relation to the Suez Canal is not nearly so close or so controlling as ours is to the Panama Canal. She did not build the canal. She did not and does not own the ground through which it runs. She does not own the canal. She merely managed to get control of a majority of the shares of stock in it after others had constructed it; and then by force and violence asserted a protectorate over Egypt, and while she pretended it was for the pacification of Egypt some will think she had control of the canal in view also. Now, mark how she interprets the provisions as to the equal rights of all the nations in time of peace as in time of war.

The Suez Canal lies between and connects two great inland seas, the Mediterranean and the Red Sea. The entrance from the ocean to each of these is quite narrow and is susceptible of control by proper fortifications at the strategic points. The nation which controls these entrances practically controls the entrance to the canal. Of course long before the canal was constructed England controlled the Strait of Gibraltar. She also had possession of Aden, a strategic position at the south entrance to the Red Sea, which she strongly fortified. Feeling that was not quite enough to command that entrance she has, since the neutralization of the canal, strongly fortified the Island of Perim, which, with the fortifications at Aden, gives her complete control of the entrance to the Red Sea, making it virtually a British lake. In addition to complete control of the entrances and exits to these two inland seas and hence to the canal, she has strong fortifications at Malta and Cyprus, in the Mediterranean, besides control of Egypt, adjacent to the canal itself.

Under these conditions, how consoling it must be to the other nations to know that the Suez Canal is completely neutralized—on paper. What European country, I ask you, would dare, under these circumstances, to send a fleet against England's Indian Empire by way of the neutralized Suez Canal? Its neutralization, on paper, is a joke; indeed, it hardly rises to the level of a joke. It is Dead Sea fruit, and turns to ashes at the touch. Is India dearer to England than California and Oregon and Washington are to us? Surely not. The Hindus differ from the British in race and religion, in everything, whereas the people of the Pacific Slope are our own people, bone of our bone. If the provision in the Suez treaty did not bind her, how can she expect a similar one in the Hay-Pauncefote to bind us? And if she chooses not to be bound as to one provision of it, why is she bound as to other provisions when she chooses to disregard them?

When the European powers protested against her actions in thus practically fortifying the Suez Canal, her representative, Lord Pauncefote, the joint author of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, said to them:

> Egypt having become British territory since the construction of the canal and the agreement with the powers, Great Britain could not be bound by the neutrality provisions adopted, so far as they affected Egypt, because it was a recognized principle of international law that treaties are only operative so long as the basic or fundamental conditions upon which they are based continue, and in the event of a fundamental change, such as the change of sovereignty of the soil, any nation which is a party to such treaty could honorably contend that it was inoperative as to her newly acquired territory.

This contention was upheld by the British Government, and the fortifications against which the protest was made were continued, apparently, in direct violation of the language in the treaty provision. I am not criticizing her for her decision in the matter; I am merely stating the facts. She had well-established principles and precedents in international law for doing what she did, providing her newly acquired interest in Egypt be conceded. I only criticize her for her inconsistency in following the well-established rule herself and then denying us the right to do likewise.

Mr. Hall, a high authority on international law, ably states the rule, as follows:

> Neither party to an international compact can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into; and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding as soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered.

Dr. Hannis Taylor, probably the highest American authority on international law, states the rule thus:

> So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was founded has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory as soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered.

He further says:

> The conclusion is irresistible that by the radical changes wrought in conditions existing at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, through subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone by the United States, the treaty as a whole became voidable. Or, to use the words of Prof. Oppenheim, that the vital change wrought by the subsequent purchase of the Canal Zone rendered an otherwise "unnotifiable treaty" notifiable. Under the universally accepted rule of rebus sic stantibus, so luminously expounded by the greatest of the recent English publicists, we have the right and Great Britain has the right to call a diplomatic conference in order to make such modifications in the terms of this voidable or "notifiable" treaty as either party may desire.

Mr. Taylor quotes Mr. Oppenheim, professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, England, as follows:

> It is an almost universally recognized fact that vital changes of circumstances may be of such a kind as to justify a party in notifying an unnotifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus.

But conditions in the Canal Zone did not remain stationary. Since the making of this treaty, in 1902, the greatest change which can take place in any political entity has taken place there, namely, a change of sovereignty. Unquestionably that change completely justifies the United States in claiming that the treaty is inoperative as to the Canal Zone, because it is newly acquired territory.

An English writer, Mr. Cox-Sinclair, concludes a long and very able article on the "International status of the Panama Canal," in the November number of the Law Magazine and Review, a quarterly London publication, as follows:

> To sum up, it is reasonably arguable—
> (a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty, that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context, and that its case is difficult to challenge on grounds of general justice;
> (b) There is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act by process of arbitration; and
> (c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Another English jurist, Mr. C. A. Hereshoff Bartlett, in discussing the question, says:

> There is no evasion of the rule of equality where all foreign vessels are subject to the same duties and liabilities under similar circumstances.

The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic or coastwise commerce and in the use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. No such restriction could have been in view in adopting "as the basis for neutralization" a rule that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. It would be absurd for the United States to solemnly declare that its own vessels of war might openly and freely navigate its own landlocked waterways and enjoy the privileges that belong to the nation as a sovereign power in the use of its own territory. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessels" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

And Count Reventlow, the noted German naval critic, says:

The canal bill interprets the Anglo-American treaty from a certain viewpoint, but is in no sense an evasion thereof. That the United States had a right to construe the treaty as Taft did can not be doubted.

In dealing with this question it must be borne in mind that a clear distinction should be made between the foreign trade and the coastwise trade of a nation.

Treaties which affect the former do not necessarily apply to the latter. Nations, for many sound and controlling reasons, usually confine their coastwise trade to their own vessels. The treaty of 1815 between Great Britain and the United States provides that—no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in the ports of England's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

A similar provision applies to the ports of the United States. Both countries have always held that this provision had no application to their domestic or coastwise trade.

This treaty was construed by the United States Supreme Court in 1904, in Olesen v. Smith (195 U. S., 344), on a question of pilotage charges.

Justice—now Chief Justice—White wrote the opinion and held that the exemption of our coastwise vessels from such charges "does not constitute a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade."

The court states the proposition thus:

In substance, the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempted from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even though such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

The court says:

Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting under the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels.

Again, in 1826 we concluded a treaty of "friendship, comity, and navigation" with Denmark which contains this language:

Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one country upon vessels of the other than are, or shall be, payable in the same ports by native vessels.

But under this provision the United States has always excepted coastwise vessels. The use of the phrase "native vessels" makes this language much stronger than the language used in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

That trade from an Atlantic port through the Panama Canal to a Pacific port, or, indeed, from any American port through the canal to any other American port by a vessel which touches no foreign port, is coastwise or domestic or interstate trade is too evident to require argument.

It is as much so as trade between two of our Atlantic ports or between Duluth and Buffalo through the "Soo" Canal, and being coastwise trade, it follows, from the unvarying practice of both England and the United States, that it is not covered by the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Am I not justified in the conclusion that treaties are made with full knowledge of the fact that boundaries and sovereignties and other conditions affected by them change, and that a material change in these conditions—in sovereignty, for instance—renders the treaty inoperative to that extent, that this treaty included the Canal Zone, and that after it was made the greatest political change possible took place in that zone, namely, a change of sovereignty; and that such change of sovereignty works a corresponding change in the terms of the treaty?

Am I not also justified in the conclusion that coastwise trade is in a different class from foreign or international ocean trade; that laws and treaties which apply to the latter do not include the former unless they specifically say so; that the treaty in question does not say so; and hence our coastwise trade is not covered by or included in it?

EXEMPTION NOT A SUBSIDY.

Is the exemption demanded in the Democratic platform and now in the law a subsidy?

If it is, and we are going to repeal it for that reason, we should be consistent and go right on with the work of repeal. We should provide for payment of tolls in the "Soo" Canal. We should provide for tolls at Boston, at Philadelphia, at Baltimore, at New Orleans, at Galveston, and a great many other places.

We should collect tolls on the Mississippi and the Ohio and the Hudson, and so on, and so on.

We have spent $700,000,000 of public money on canals and rivers and harbors, and we are spending a lot more on them every year, without getting a single cent in return. True, it has always been our national policy to facilitate commerce between the States; true, the Constitution, our fundamental law, provided for the encouragement of interstate commerce by prohibiting the creation of obstacles or barriers to such commerce; but if we are going to abandon that policy now, let us be consistent and go the whole distance.

It is not the amount involved that determines the value of a principle. If free tolls through a canal which cost $400,000,000 is a subsidy and wrong, so is free tolls through a canal costing only $4,000,000.

Seventy-two million five hundred thousand tons passed through the Soo Canal in 1912. At 25 cents a ton, that amounts to a subsidy of eighteen millions a year to lake commerce. We have spent vast amounts on lake harbors. No payments are being made in return. Such expenditure is in the nature of a subsidy, and should be stopped. If we embark on this line, I repeat, we should be consistent.

The claim that toll exemption is a subsidy rests on the theory that the benefit of free tolls will not reach the public; that trust-owned ships would be engaged in the coastwise carrying trade through the canal; that competition with the railroads would be strangled and the tolls appropriated by the Shipping Trust.

But gentlemen overlook the fact that section 2 of the existing canal law prohibits all trust and railroad owned or controlled vessels from using the canal at all. If the law is enforced—and we must assume that it will be—how can the trusts or the railroads benefit by free tolls? What better way could be devised to break up a shipping trust, so far as the coastwise trade is concerned? If no trust-owned ships could use the canal, how could the Shipping Trust benefit by it?

Under this provision, it seems to me, the coastwise freights would surely be reduced to the extent of the toll, and the competing railroads, both in the United States and Canada, would have to meet this reduction, at least at competing points. On the other hand, if coastwise vessels have to pay tolls, the amount will be added to the freight charges and later, of course, added to the price of the thing carried. This will enable competing transcontinental railroads to add the amount of the tolls to their freight charges, so that the tolls thus become an indirect subsidy to them.

It may be said that condition could be corrected by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Well, there are many inequalities in transcontinental freight rates they have not corrected, but even if we grant that might be done in the States, we know the commission has no jurisdiction over Canada's two transcontinental lines, and the subsidy would surely go to them.

I am as bitterly opposed to monopoly as anyone. I hate it very cordially; but we can not suppress progress or sit like a bump on a log for fear activity might result in the creation of a monopoly. We must keep pushing onward, and deal with the monopoly if it appears. In the matter of our ocean carrying trade, there is much food for reflection. "It is a condition, not a theory, which confronts us." Sometimes one has to adopt methods he does not approve of, because all his neighbors have adopted them.

We pay about one hundred and thirty-five millions a year to foreign shipowners for carrying our foreign commerce. In 1911 we carried only 8.8 per cent of it in American ships. The other 91.2 per cent was carried in foreign bottoms. Subsidized foreign ships partly explains this.

England paid $1,663,920 as subsidy to the Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. on its ships going through the Suez Canal. The tolls were $1,665,000—only $80 more than the subsidy. The North German Lloyd Line to the Orient received $1,385,160 from the Government, which more than paid the canal tolls. In 1908 France paid to their oriental lines subsidies amounting to $2,145,000, probably three times the amount of the tolls. In 1909 Japan paid $1,336,000 to a line operating through the Suez Canal, or about two and one-half times the tolls. Nearly all European countries are doing the same thing. Spain has already passed a law reimbursing the Panama tolls to her ships. Russia has done likewise.

We can not get these nations to quit this practice, and we can hardly expect Americans to go into the ocean carrying trade against such competition.

But if we permit foreign subsidized ships to do all our foreign carrying, we will be at their mercy in time of peace as to rates, and we will suffer even more for the want of ships to do our carrying in time of war.

I do not urge, or even suggest, subsidies in aid of vessels engaged in international trade. If possible, other means should be found to restore the American flag to the high seas. It is, of course, humiliating that 92 per cent of the products of our fields and factories which go abroad are carried in foreign bottoms, and that our flag is almost unknown in foreign ports; but that question is not directly involved here. The question is rather whether we shall continue the policy we have always followed in encouraging commerce between the States, in reserving our interstate trade to ships flying our flag, and in giving them the advantage of the free use of the new canal just as we have given them the free use of all canals and waterways and harbors built or improved by the Government in the past. Shall we change a policy as old as our Government, and—humiliating thought—shall we change it at the dictation of a foreign nation—a nation, too, that is far from anxious to see us develop in a maritime way?

Great Britain's position as a great nation absolutely depends on her naval supremacy, a fact of which she is well aware. She is extremely jealous of the maritime and naval growth of other great powers, including the United States. She has rarely failed to strike a would-be competitor before it became too formidable. Spain, Holland, and France could testify to that. Nor have we escaped.

In no other nation has she encountered an opponent that ship to ship, gun to gun, and man to man was capable of successfully contesting with her the question of supremacy on the high seas.

One country, and one only, has demonstrated that in seamanship, in courage, in resourcefulness, it is her superior, and that country is the United States. From the capture of the Marguerita in June, 1775, till victory perched on the banner of MacDonough at Plattsburg in 1814 this superiority clearly appeared. In the Revolutionary War on almost every occasion where the conditions were equal or nearly so the American ship was victor, and in the War of 1812 that experience was repeated. Add to this the fact that in the extent of our material resources we also outclass her, and the further fact that as, in the building of the Panama Canal, difficulties apparently unsurmountable only stimulate us, that we are very apt to accomplish what we undertake, and it becomes clear why Great Britain dreads, and has reason to dread, our entry into the lists to challenge her maritime supremacy. She much prefers that we should not take the first step in that direction, and she may well feel that exemption from tolls for our coastwise vessels is such a step.

For those who think her incapable of such views let me refer to some comparatively recent histotry.

In 1860 our foreign carrying trade was 6,803,368 tons; hers was 13,914,923 tons, only twice as great as ours. In 1880 ours had fallen to 6,217,893 tons, while hers was 41,348,984 tons. Ours fell off 9 per cent in those 20 years, while hers more than trebled.

But what had Great Britain to do with that? Everything. She did it; she struck the blow. She was too keen to overlook and too worldly-wise to neglect the opening our Civil War afforded. Her shipyards rang with activity, building Floridas and Shenandoahs and Alabamas, which were not only built but armed and even manned in her ports, and then sent out upon the high seas to prey upon and destroy our commerce, which they very effectually succeeded in doing. Foolish navigation laws and equally foolish tariff laws have supplemented her work of destruction, so that in 1912 our carrying trade was only 9,865,766 tons, while hers reached the enormous total of 88,666,766 tons. In those 52 years ours increased 45 per cent, while hers increased 545 per cent.

True she was found guilty in an international court and adjudged to pay us $16,000,000 damages, but $16,000,000 a year since the award was made in 1872 would hardly compensate us for the damage done to our commerce and our rapidly growing merchant marine.

Granting free passage through the canal would make a start toward the resuscitation of our merchant marine, and might lead to the realization of our hope that American ships might again cover the seas and carry our flag to every port, a consummation by us devoutly to be wished, by her devoutly to be prevented, and the treaty offers an opportunity to carry out her policy. Reading between the lines it seems reasonably clear she has been able to supplement her position on the toll question by a shrewd use of international complications to such an extent that for the first time in our history we are afraid to confront a situation and deal with it on its merits, and that we must waive our rights in order to avoid more serious difficulties. I confess I do not like such a course. The words of Charles C. Pinckney come to my lips and will not be repressed, "Millions for defense but not one cent for tribute." [Applause.]

The first position taken by the British foreign office clearly acceded to the view that we were within our rights in relieving our coastwise ships of canal tolls.

While the act providing for free tolls was pending, on July 8, 1912, Mr. Innes, a representative of the British Embassy at Washington, filed a note on behalf of his Government with Secretary of State Knox. That note read:

> If trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Secretary Knox replied to that note as follows:

> On this point—to exempt all American shipping from tolls—Sir Edward Grey says that His Majesty's Government does not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to the United States shipping generally or to any particular branches of that shipping.
> It is admitted in his note that the exemption of certain classes of ships would be "a form of subsidy" to those vessels; but it appears from the note that His Majesty's Government would regard that form of subsidy as objectionable under the treaty if the effect of such subsidy would be "to impose upon British or other foreign shipping an unfair share of the burden of the upkeep of the canal or create a discrimination in respect of the conditions or charges of passage, or otherwise to prejudice rights secured to British shipping by this treaty."

This reply shows that the British position admits our right to grant subsidies to our ships if we choose; that they were only interested to the extent of keeping the tolls down to a reasonable rate—that is, that we would not remit tolls to our own ships and then charge theirs and other nations' ships unreasonably high tolls to make up the difference.

This was a reasonable contention; but the tolls were fixed so low as to take all merit out of it. A maximum toll charge of $1.25 per ton and a maximum charge of $1.50 for each adult person has been fixed by law; and the President is authorized, in his discretion, to reduce, but not to raise, these charges.

Great Britain is not in a position to complain of these charges while she charges as high as $1.30 per ton and $1.93 for each adult passenger through the Suez Canal, although the total amount expended on the Suez Canal up to 1910 was only $126,642,406, as against $400,000,000 for the Panama Canal. As the Panama Canal cost considerably more than three times as much as the Suez Canal and charges lower tolls, there was and could be little room for complaint on that score. Indeed, the negotiations were proceeding smoothly and newspapers on both sides of the Atlantic predicted an early and satisfactory settlement on the basis of the act of August 24, 1912, including free tolls for American coastwise ships.

Secretary Knox addressed a communication to Sir Edward Grey on January 17, 1913, along the lines indicated and anticipated an early agreement. In the meantime, on July 21, Senator Root, of New York, one of the trustees of the Carnegie Peace Foundation and, according to newspaper statements, Mr. Carnegie's legal adviser, made a speech of great length on the floor of the Senate attacking exemption of coastwise ships as a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and demanding that it be repealed. Among other things, he charged that the bill practically passed by default. He said:

> The Members of both Houses were not working with their full vigor. We were weary, physically and mentally. Such discussion as was, was to empty seats.

As a matter of fact, it has been shown from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the attendance in both Houses was unusually good and the discussion vigorous.

Senator Root's suggestion was promptly seized and acted on by the British foreign office.

Secretary Knox's note of July 17 was ignored altogether and a brief note sent to the State Department through Ambassador Bryce curtly informed Mr. Knox:

> It is unnecessary to repeat that a reference to arbitration would be rendered superfluous if steps were taken by the United States Government to remove the objection entertained by His Majesty's Government to the act.

In other words, "Great Britain is entirely willing that the United States Government shall act on Senator Root's suggestion and repeal the clause exempting its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls." In justice to ex-President Taft and Mr. Knox it should be stated that they had no knowledge of Senator Root's attitude or intentions.

Since that time the position of Great Britain has been that under the treaty we have no right to charge less tolls to ships flying the Stars and Stripes—whether coastwise or otherwise—than we charge ships flying the British flag. This brings us back to the meaning of the phrase "all nations" in the treaty. If that phrase includes the United States, then we have forfeited all strategic advantage in time of war and all industrial advantage in time of peace, although we spent $400,000,000 to accomplish these very purposes. Our fleet in going through our canal to save our property and our honor must have no advantage over the enemy's fleet that is striving to destroy both.

Can anyone believe that John Hay or the United States Senate was ever guilty of such monstrous folly?

Clearly Great Britain must be bringing great pressure to bear on our Government in this affair, for it can be no trifling matter which induces the President to say to Congress that "we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we are right or wrong."

My experience leads me to believe that yielding to pressure in the face of difficulties is but an invitation to those applying the pressure to take further advantage when new difficulties arise, and that the best time to resist is when the first unreasonable demand is made.

The canal is ours. The ground it occupies is ours. American genius planned and executed the whole stupendous enterprise. No other nation shared in it, and while the American people are willing to treat all the nations fairly—nay liberally—in the use of it, they will never consent to joint ownership of it or joint control over it. The Panama Canal is now, and so long as the spirit of the great declaration prevails among us it shall continue to be an American ditch. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, when the Gamboa dike was destroyed and the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific mingled together, not only the physical geography of the world was changed but the political relations of all nations were altered. Trade routes were destroyed and new ones created. The political relation of every great nation to every other was changed for all time. The security from attack that a continent gave to the Nations was swept away. Never again can the old status of the world be restored. And to no nation on the globe did the change mean as much as to the United States. As was well said in prophecy, we made a new coast line for America. It was the consciousness that this result must follow that made the United States chafe under the restrictions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and delayed for many years initiation of the work until conditions thereby imposed could be honorably removed and the exclusive control of the canal in its political aspect secured to ourselves. This it was believed was accomplished when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified, and the concessions obtained from Panama and set forth in the Hay-Varilla treaty were secured. This the United States will never surrender, and this no American that I have ever heard of proposes to surrender. But the opponents of the measure to repeal the provisions of the canal act giving and permitting preference to American shipping in all their arguments constantly assert that this is the result of such repeal.

If I believed for one moment that we were by our action here to be taken this day, surrendering our political control over the canal, I should never consent to vote "aye" on the bill. But there is an entire distinction between the surrender of that right and the keeping of an agreement touching equality of use of that canal in a commercial sense.

The trouble with these gentlemen is that they can not or will not distinguish between our rights incident to our sovereignty in the Canal Zone, limited though it is, and our obligations as the operator of that canal relative to its commercial use. But though they can not or will not recognize the distinction, it exists and can not be ignored if we are to come to a correct conclusion touching our rights and duties in the pending matter. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is one of remarkable brevity. It contains but a few hundred words, nearly half of which are words of ceremony and have no bearing on its meaning. That a treaty of such brevity should make clear beyond dispute all matters with which it deals could not be expected. Many constructions can and have been placed upon its various terms, and it is impossible to reach any conclusion of first magnitude touching it that can not in some measure be assailed by ingenuous gentlemen intent on reaching a different construction. By the ingenuity that many have displayed, a treaty, no matter how detailed, would meet the same fate. In arriving at the conclusion I shall reach I shall assail the patriotism of no man. I shall not find it necessary to claim any monopoly of Americanism, as my opponents do. In attempting to aid the House in arriving at a correct conclusion of the issue before us, I shall not appeal to your prejudices or attempt to excite your passions. Let me, however, in passing but say that I have but little patience with the plea so eloquently made by many gentlemen that we can not repeal these preference clauses without in the future surrendering to Great Britain in every contention that may ever be made. If we are not justified in making these preferences, we should repeal them, and we can well trust America's rights to be upheld in the future as they have always been in the past. I have too much faith in my country, its strength, its courage, to hesitate in what I believe is a plain duty for fear of the future. Let me repeat what I said the other day, that it is only the weakling that hesitates to take a right step for fear his motive may be questioned.

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS.

Mr. Speaker, in that speech I indicated somewhat the argument I propose now to make. I then called attention to the fact that America from the beginning had always stood for the freedom of the seas, and to now contend for exclusive privileges was to reverse a policy initiated in the beginning of our country. Now, I submit that in the construction of a treaty which is in doubt, it is both proper and necessary to consider the general position occupied by a party to it in relation to the broad subject matter of it. If such position on other matters of similar character is plain, then in the absence of clear language to the contrary that interpretation most consistent with such position must be adopted. Freedom of the seas means equality on the seas. Time forbids that I should now recite the long list of instances in which the United States has insisted on its claim to freedom and equality of treatment. This rule of equality is so generally recognized by all nations as to the high seas and all international waterways that it is difficult for us to realize that when we were a young and feeble nation, and first voiced our protest against inequality, the great nations were seeking to divide the waters even as the lands of the earth. Does anyone believe that the nation foremost in its advocacy of such freedom can now deal with the Panama Canal, the greatest of all waterways, in a narrow preferential way without invoking similar action by other nations touching other waterways, and without forcing a return to those darker days of a century past? Can it be believed that a construction of this treaty we made can be warranted with such a result following? Does it answer to say it is our canal, we built it, our money paid for it, therefore we have the right? Will not such a claim of ownership as to other waterways be as plausibly urged to justify similar action on the part of others? Will such contention add to the peace of the world? Will our position enhance our power as an advocate of world peace? America's destiny lies not along such lines.

Doubtless in the atmosphere of those who scoff at the generosity of a nation that could spend such huge sums as they recite the canal has cost, and who, while insisting that such expenditures demand a special privilege to ourselves, would exercise that privilege in behalf of a limited number of our citizens engaged in a legalized monopoly, this plea will seem immaterial to the issue.

AMERICA'S POLICY TOWARD AN ISTHMIAN CANAL.

I hasten, then, to a review of events and the declarations that accompanied them touching the building of an isthmian canal. And I submit that from the time the discussion first began our expressed desire has been to aid the building of a canal for the free and equal use of all the nations.

In 1826 Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State, wrote to our representatives at a Panama congress that—

> A cut or canal for purposes of navigation somewhere through the Isthmus that connects the two Americas, to unite the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, will form a proper subject of consideration. That vast object, if it should ever be accomplished, will be interesting in a greater or less degree to all parts of the world. If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls.

In 1835, nine years later, the Senate of the United States adopted this resolution:

> Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations, and particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of effectually protecting, by suitable treaty stipulations with them, such individuals or companies as may undertake to open communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America and of securing forever by such stipulations the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations, on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established, to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work.

In 1839 the House of Representatives passed a resolution in the same language.

This was followed in 1846 by the treaty between the United States and New Granada.

This treaty, among other things, guaranteed to the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of communication that now exist or may be hereafter constructed shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States. President Polk, in transmitting the treaty to the Senate, after reciting the benefits and obligations it created, said:

In entering into the mutual guaranties proposed by the thirty-fifth article of the treaty, neither the Government of New Granada nor that of the United States has any narrow or exclusive views. The ultimate object, as presented by the Senate of the United States in their resolution (of March 3, 1835) to which I have already referred, is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus. If the United States as the chief of the American nations should first become a party to this guaranty it can not be doubted—indeed, it is confidently expected by the Government of New Granada—that similar guaranties will be given to that Republic by Great Britain and France.

Following this came the Clayton-Bulwer treaty with Great Britain in 1850.

I shall not now delay you with a recital of the facts touching Great Britain's possessions in the Caribbean Sea or her claims touching Central America. This has been repeatedly set forth by others.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Let me, however, read you what Secretary Olney said touching the effect of the treaty and our reasons for entering into it. In a memorandum in 1896, among other things, he said:

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty had its origin in an earnest desire on the part of the Government and people of this country to shorten the transit and to facilitate the communications between our then newly acquired possessions on the Pacific coast and the rest of the United States. California was acquired in 1848, and the opening of its gold fields and the rush of population thither followed almost immediately. In 1849, the United States, by treaty with Nicaragua, secured concessions in favor of an American company organized for the construction of a canal between the two oceans via the lakes of Nicaragua and the River San Juan. Two obstacles, however, stood in the way of this company's successful prosecution of the work. One was the rights asserted by Great Britain over the Mosquito Coast. The other was the inability to procure the necessary capital in this country, or to procure it in England or elsewhere abroad, so long as the enterprise was conducted under purely American auspices. To remove the first of these difficulties, in 1849, Mr. Clayton, the then Secretary of State, applied to the British Government, through its minister at Washington, for the withdrawal of the British pretensions to dominion over the Mosquito Coast. The answer was a refusal, coupled with an intimation that Great Britain was willing to enter into a treaty for a joint protectorate over the proposed canal. It being supposed, undoubtedly, that if the canal were built under British protection the only remaining obstacle to its construction, namely, want of sufficient capital, would also disappear, negotiations were set on foot between the two Governments on the basis of the British proposal. They progressed with great rapidity and with the result that in June, 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was signed.

The treaty is characterized by certain remarkable features. It contains numerous and apt provisions for the protection, safety, and neutralization of the proposed ship canal; but it deals not merely with the particular subject matter which, in the view of the United States, led to its negotiation. It also deals with others of larger magnitude, contemplates alliances with other powers, and lays down general principles for the future guidance of the parties. The United States, in entering upon the negotiation, aimed to accomplish two specific things—the renunciation by Great Britain of its claim to the Mosquito Coast and such a protectorate over the canal by Great Britain jointly with the United States as might be expected to attract to the canal British capital. As the result of the negotiations, it secured not only the two things specified, but also a third, viz, Great Britain's express agreement, so far as Central America was concerned, to give effect to the so-called Monroe doctrine. For these advantages it rendered, of course, a consideration. It waived the Monroe doctrine to the extent of the joint protectorate of the then proposed canal, and by article 8 agreed to waive it as respects all other practicable communications across the isthmus connecting North and South America, whether by canal or railway. In short, the true operation and effect of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is that, as respects Central America generally, Great Britain has expressly bound herself to the Monroe doctrine, while, as respects all water and land interoceanic communications across the isthmus, the United States has expressly bound itself to so far waive the Monroe doctrine as to admit Great Britain to a joint protectorate.

He then discusses at length whether the treaty was still binding upon us, concluding, as he must, that it was. That question, if ever seriously entertained, is put to rest by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, whereby the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is expressly superseded.
